Bro Cozine embraced religion in early life, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he served as class leader for several years. He came to Louisiana in 1848, and, as too many others have done, failed to unite with the church, neglected other Christian duties, and for a number of years lived an unworthy life, during the year 1870, under the ministry of Rev. N. A. Graves, Bro. Cozine united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Franklin, La. He soon was called to official position in the church, filling various offices, such as steward, Sunday-school superintendent, and class leader. He spent the last twelve years of his life in Washington, La., where he was highly respected by all classes as a faithful man of God. A few days before he came to the kingdom of his Master, he said to his wife, "I shall go to heaven."

After two years suffering, during which he was attacked with paralysis, from which he never recovered, he [illegible] to convalescence, only to be confined to his room. Jesus was manifested to him, and he longed and [illegible] to be with Christ, which is far better. He suffered much in the last days of his illness, and always when at all conscious, talked much of Jesus and his salvation. He passed away to be for ever with the Lord. Before the baptism of the Holy Ghost is enough, but get the Magic Power.

In [illegible] to assist the owner in his prayer, and [illegible] for the [illegible] to open, with the Master's sign, say, "Opening, come up higher."

The night before he died he said he was perfectly ready to depart. That he knew we should come and [illegible] that his wife and two children might all live and meet him in the better world.

She has been a great sufferer for many years, for the most part of the time much [illegible] bed, but she submitted to all with [illegible] humility, and manifested a sweet serenity and entire [illegible] in all that was going on in the church and world. She delighted in dispensing a generous hospitality. So long gave her husband such pleasure as to have the ministers and their friends under their roof on the occasion of special meetings to provide entertainment for the body, while they themselves received spiritual cheer. She has been expecting death at any time for many years, hence the summons found her with her lamp burning and with [illegible] house in order.

JOHN E. JONES was born September 29, 1806, in Pickens county, Ala., and, moving to Mississippi in 1834, he settled in Winn parish, near where he has lived nearly ever since, and died January 25, 1881.

He was a little above fifty-one years of age, and has been in very feeble health, suffering a great deal at times, during the last two years, yet his death was unexpected to himself and friends at the time, until a few hours before it came. He has been married three times; by his third wife he has nine children, the children of the former wives are all grown or nearly so.

He was a good citizen, faithful husband and father, and will be greatly missed in all the relations of life in that community. He was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at St. Maurice, during the year 1857, under Rev. F. J. Hough, and has been a consistent, liberal, earnest and energetic Christian ever since. He has done a great deal for building up the church in that community, especially pecuniarly. He will be missed more in the completion of our church edifice, toward the building of this far he has done so much. May God raise up another in his stead.

Bro. Jones died in perfect peace and rests in Christ, and we shall see him again if we are faithful. May God help us!

At a meeting of the "Ladies' Aid Society of Felicity Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South," of New Orleans, the following resolutions were adopted:

Be it Solved, As God in his providence has permitted death to enter our church and remove from our midst our beloved sister, MRS. BERTHA KOPPS, who has been a member of this society from its organization, a period of seven years, always filling her place in the most efficient and edifying manner;

Resolved, We bow in submission to the Divine will feeling our loss to be her eternal gain.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be rendered to the bereaved husband and family, who have our heartfelt sympathy.

Resolved, That a copy be sent to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication.

MRS. NANCY RUMBLEY was born in Jasper county, Georgia, August 3, 1811; moved with her parents to Alabama in September, 1831; became the second wife of Mr. W. P. Rumbley, who still lives to mourn her loss; departed this life, October 20, 1880, leaving behind her the precious legacy of her faith in Christ, and a happy exit from this to a brighter home above.

She was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for many years. She exhibited in her daily life great patience under the many crosses and severe trials through which she was called to pass. As a wife, she was obedient, gentle, loving; as a mother, she was tender, affectionate and kind. How sad the home without the cheerful, Christian mother and the praying, sympathetic wife. May this sad providence be sanctified to all the family and relatives.

THE DAILY DRILL.

BY MARGARET M. PRESTON.

O, this battle-field vast, of the world!
This trample and rush of the foe—
This gage that forever is hurled—
This constant recoil of the blow!

This sovereign command of the King
Proclaim, through his armaments wide,
That none of his soldiers shall fling
Their harness one moment aside!

For such as are summoned to stand
In trenches that quicken the breath—
How can they, with weapon in hand,
Do other than dare to the death?

But we, who lie camping beyond,
A hail from the shock of the fray,
Held close by that rigorous bond,
The important drill of the day—

What need that we brace for the fight?
What call that our courage be steeled?
No leader would urge, if he might,
Reserves so untried, to the field.

How know we? some morning may bring,
As the boom of the battle begun,
An order direct from the King,
"Advance! there is work to be done!"

Then, what if our banners be tossed
Aside where the rubbish is thrust?
And what if equipments be lost,
And sword-blades be tarnished with rust?

Nay—better to practice complete
Our duty with soldierly skill,
Even though it be only to meet
The daily demands of the drill!

And then, if the King should inspect
His lines, as he suddenly might,
How calm we will stand! how erect!
Assured that our weapons are bright!

Our Pulpit.

The Intermediate State.

PREACHED IN ST. PAUL'S METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, BY REV. J. B. A. ARDISS, D.D.

The spirit shall return unto God, who gave it.—ECCLESIASTES 12.

Many who believe that there will be a resurrection of the body on the last day, doubt the truth, that the human soul, as an entity, will continue to exist consciously after the death of the body. Materialistic in their views, they can not conceive things spiritual, nor spiritual existence.

It can not be denied that the doctrine of the intermediate state has its difficulties. It is a fact that our spirit, as regards our sublunary existence, is wholly dependent on the body, it increases and decreases proportionately with the body. In the infant, for instance, when the body is helpless and frail, the indwelling human spirit is equally so. With the development of the body, the spirit develops to the proportion. From this, it would follow, that the spirit is dependent for development on the developing intellect, the intellect on the brain, the brain on the blood, the blood on the entire physical organism. Hence the inference would be: Without physical organism, no conscious existence of the human spirit.

Again, when with old age the strength of the body gradually diminishes, the vigor of the spirit diminishes in due proportion, until with great feebleness and helplessness of old age, dotage, too, is complete. From this proportionate diminution, it might be inferred, that with the cessation of physical existence, the spirit, too, would cease to exist.

The inferences drawn from the proportionate development and diminution of body and spirit may seem plausible, but they are nothing more than plausible. We shall adduce three proofs which will establish incontrovertibly the verity of an intermediate state, that is, a continued conscious existence of the human spirit after the demise of the body, until the reunion of the same with the latter on the last day.

I. The human spirit is frequently astonishingly, and in some sense, consciously active, when the body is in a state much resembling death. For instance:

1. During sleep in dreams. While in the embrace of nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep, the spirit seems to be increasingly active and frequently gives us proof of its activity by dreams. Spirit can not sleep. True, we are not conscious of constantly dreaming while sleeping, but that does not refute the supposition that the spirit is always awake and at work. Even during our waking hours, only few of our cogitations and reflections make a lasting impression. The vast bulk of our cogitations during our waking hours are but a chaotic conglomerate, unable to make a lasting imprint on our memory. Much of the spirit's work during sleep is of chaotic character, hence no impression, no remembrance. Like the Shepherd of Israel, even the human spirit neither sleepeth nor slumbereth.

2. The same is observable in a state of somnambulism. We have no time here to explain what it is and how it is caused. Enough, that we know, that in such state the spirit is even more vivacious and active than when the body is in its normal state. Men of meagre literary attainments, while in a state of somnambulism, have written poems, orations, treatises, so faultless and excellent as during their waking hours they could not have produced. And what is strangely remarkable, the body in such state, seems to be under the supreme control of the spirit, being temporarily exempt from known laws of nature. The law of gravitation, for instance, does not affect him. The somnambulist walks without danger of falling along the brink of precipices, the cornices of high edifices. Though his eyes are tightly shut, he seems to see all that transpires around him.

3. Again, under the influence of chloroform and other chemicals the spirit is conscious and active, though the body is temporarily paralyzed. In such state connection between spirit and body seems to be entirely severed. An incision in the flesh and bone causes no pain, for the simple reason that the communication between spirit and body had been broken. But notwithstanding this severance, so that our conscious spirit is not conscious of any bodily ailment, the spirit is uninterruptedly active.

From this we infer that, since the spirit is able consciously to exist and to act in a state of the body closely akin to death, presumably the human soul as an entity will consciously live and act after the body lies beneath the sod of the valley.

II. Our second argument in support of the doctrine of an intermediate state is taken from our knowledge of angels, good and bad, called in the Bible, "spirits." St. Paul says of them: "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister unto them who shall be heirs of salvation?" But a spirit is not without flesh and blood. Angels, then, are spiritual entities. True, they have occasionally appeared in human form, but that form was nothing more than a mere temporary production, miraculously called into existence for a special purpose, like the gourd of Jonah. Such human form was equally miraculously reduced to nonentity. But though spirits bona-fide, disconnected with bodies, their powers are vast and their actions marvellous. The good spirits are powerful for good, the bad spirits equally potent for diabolism.

The good spirits rejoiced when our terraqueous ball in its virgin purity and beauty issued from the creative hand of the Omnipotent. "The morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy." They transmitted messages of God to men, strengthened and encouraged the good, even Jesus, they move with the rapidity of thought, and disseminate happiness and bliss wherever they go. Their number is large. Gehazi found, where the Lord had answered Elisha's prayer, that the mountain was encompassed by the hosts of the Lord, and that those who were for his master, the prophet, outnumbered those who were against him.

The bad angels are not less numerous and powerful. As appears from the Book of Job, first chapter, devils have power over the atmosphere which we breathe, for it was in accordance with satanic arrangement, that Job should inhale the seeds of a contagious disease. Also over the elements, for the hurricane buried his sons beneath the debris of the house in which they were feasting. Over the hearts of men, for it was owing to satanic instigations that the Sabeans and Chaldeans made their thievish raids on Job's herds. A truth ponderous and ominous is conveyed in Ephesians 6, 12: "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

They fill the earth,
They throng the skies,
They darken heaven's bright face,

And are now angels, good and bad; able, as spirits consciously to live and act, what should cause us to disbelieve in an intermediate state of the human spirit, that is, that the human spirit could consciously live and act after the death of the body? Take the angels, our spirits will be able, independent of the body, to live, move, and have their being, blessing or cursing, building up or tearing down, rejoicing or wailing over men.

III. Our next argument in support of our doctrine is taken from expressed Bible passages, to answer to the prayer of the malefactor on the cross, Christ asserts: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, to-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." Cavilers object to the punctuation of this verse. They advocate the transposition of the comma from after the word "you," to after the word "to-day." Thus changing the meaning maliciously. This "to-day" has no reference to the time of Christ's utterance, but to the time of the penitent thief's entrance into Paradise. As if Christ had said: As soon as our eyes shall close in death, our liberated spirits will immediately, without intermission, jointly enter heaven.

Paul, who had been translated to the third heaven, and heard and seen things of which it was not lawful for him to speak, knew beyond question, that there was a state of conscious existence for the human soul after the death of the body, when he exclaims: "I desire to depart, and be with Christ."

Stephen, the first martyr, had a vision of the glorious state of disembodied spirits and the spiritual hereafter, and immediately he prays: "Lord, Jesus, receive my spirit."

Our Divine Master instructs: "Fear not those that kill the body, but can not hurt the soul." No weapon can terminate our spiritual existence; no poison can extinguish it.

The immutable parable of Dives and Lazarus throws much favorable light upon our doctrine. The dying and conveyance of Lazarus to Abraham's bosom were simultaneous. Neither was there an intermission of time between the burial and the awakening in hell of the rich man.

Our text caps the climax of our scriptural proofs. Explicitly it states: "The spirit must return to God, who gave it."

IV. Objections have been raised against our doctrine of an intermediate state.

1. If there is an intermediate state, cavilers say, in which the disembodied human soul can consciously live, live highly exalted above all that is terrestrial, transcends all our fairest conceptions of happiness, why, then, again cage the liberated, happy spirit on the last day? Why, then, have a resurrection of the body, since the body is but an encumbrance to the spirit, and since the spirit can apparently live superlatively happy without the body. There is either no resurrection of the body, or the doctrine of an intermediate state is a chimera. The one renders the other superfluous, the acceptance of both would be wickedly to stultify our all-wise Maker.

Not at all. Paul says: "It is sown a natural body, and is raised a spiritual body." That is, a body far superior to the clumsy structure which our spirit now inhabits. The reunion of our spirit with the resurrection body will not be a resuscitation of the spirit, but rather the continuation of God's plans of making man absolutely happy.

2. Another objection is this: If the human spirit consciously exists after the death of the body, it exists as a happy or an unhappy spirit. Hence, judgment in some manner had already been rendered in their behalf. Presumably, in accordance with the law of the fitness of things, the disembodied spirit will at once go to its proper place. Would not now the announced judgment on the last day be a work of supererogation?

The last judgment will certainly be held, and it is certainly necessary. But, we conceive, it is necessary not so much on account of those to be judged, but on account of the Judge. Wickedly spoken against throughout all generations, reviled, Christ must have an opportunity publicly to demonstrate that he was no pretender, but very God. It is then that, in the presence of assembled myriads of happy and unhappy spirits, angels and devils, all knees shall confess that Jesus Christ is the Lord.

And now, my dear hearers, only a thin partition separates us from the spirit-land. Dying and living either in heaven or hell are simultaneous. The body dies and returns to its constituent elements, but the spirit returns to its source, to God. Why, then? Oh! why, then, so painfully solicitous about the welfare of the body, the body which will soon be consumed by worms, and neglect the spirit which will live forever, either in weal or woe? Why suffer the spirit to be engrossed with temporal affairs, why suffer it to be defiled with sin, and consequently lose it? What would it profit a man if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Lose it, i. e., lose that happy existence for it, for which it was destined by our Maker.

A Russian official had drawn his semi-annual salary from the state exchequer. It was paid him in one bank-note of a large denomination. On his way home, he purchased for a few pennies, a few mellow apples, for his little boy, five years old. Upon his arrival at home, in the presence of his wife, the official presented both the bank-note and the apples to his son, offering to select one of the two. The father took pains to explain to his son that with the bank-note he could purchase several ship-loads full of apples. But the apples in hand were indeed mellow and delicious. "What will you take?" said the fond father. The boy chose the red-cheeked apples and immediately began to consume them.

Be not like that foolish boy!

When Severus, a celebrated Roman emperor, died, he said: What is worth possessing of things temporal, I possessed; but all is as nothing. In a short while a little vase will contain all that is left of the mighty emperor.

Sisera, a celebrated actress, had attained to the zenith of fame. But she, too, must die. On her death-bed she had brought to her her treasures of diamonds and jewelry, mementos of victories achieved. There were presents from many crowned heads of Europe. Tearfully viewing the display of her wealth, she mournfully ejaculated: Ye are mementoes of happy days gone by forever. Yes, I must leave these treasures, these trophies of victories won. Then, for the last time assuming a dramatic attitude of the feeble body, the expression of the wan face and the tremulous voice, she exclaimed: Ye gods! oh! ye gods, have winding-sheets no pockets? No, no pockets. She died and left her treasures to others.

Come bathe your spirit in the blood of Jesus. Make your garments white in the blood of the Lamb. That will ensure happiness and heaven.

MISSIONARY.

—It is generally known that the various Presbyterian churches represented in India have formed an alliance called the "Presbyterian Alliance of India." The Alliance has just held its second council at Allahabad. Of the twelve churches belonging to the Alliance, nearly all sent representatives, some of the absentees being prevented by the great distance to be travelled, four being present. Dr. Morrison, of the United States, was chosen moderator. The proceedings were harmonious and constructive, largely the chief topic of the Council Viz., the union of the native communities of the various Presbyterian churches in India into one Presbyterian organization under one General Assembly. To this end several resolutions were adopted, as follows:

"1. It was resolved to ask the several supreme judicatories at home for judicial powers to settle finally all cases of appeal in connection with the Native Church in matters of discipline. It was urged that this was in effect asking for power to do only what these supreme courts could not do themselves.

"2. It was further resolved to submit the Revised Draft of Proposed Questions to be put to Licentiates and Ruling Elders connected with native churches in India, prepared by a Joint Committee of the Church of Scotland, the Free Church of Scotland, and the Irish Presbyterian Church, to the several Churches which were not joined in the compilation, for approval.

"3. It was also resolved that the various presbyteries in India should be communicated with, for the purpose of forming themselves into provincial synods, to watch over the interests of the Native Church within their bounds, and to consider appeals that might come before them from the presbyteries.

"4. It was finally resolved that the supreme judicatories at home be asked to sanction a scheme for the establishment at Allahabad of a college, with not less than three ordained professors, in which a complete theological training would be given through the medium of English and Hindi; the college to be under the control of the managing committee of the council and to be supported by the various churches proportionately according to their respective outlays in India. Several delegates had been instructed by their presbyteries to urge the establishment of such a college, as being a felt want, which no one denomination could hope at present to supply for itself except by an extravagant annual expenditure, and because, under the present irregular system of instruction, candidates for the ministry were not receiving the careful training which their position demanded."—New York Independent.

One of the missionaries of the Livingstone Inland Mission writes from Manyanga, which is far up the Congo River, on the north side, announcing his arrival at that place, November 2, 1880. Manyanga is about three fifths of the distance from the coast to Stanley Pool. Mr. McCall says he is in advance of Stanley's party, but has traveled under great difficulties and annoyances. He lost half of his donkeys, having only eleven left. From Manyanga canoes will be used, as there is a long stretch of river free from rapids. The company has suffered much from fever. Mr. McCall writes:

"We hope and intend to erect a large station at this most important place, the largest market in the country, Manyanga, where people congregate, from far and near, every week, to hold their market, a great business with the natives. They are keen traders and very fond of buying and selling. We have, thanks be to God, as yet not been forcibly opposed by the peoples. I have not yet had an interview with the 'big king' of the place. He lives one day's journey from here; but our arrangements are not yet complete. When they are, I hope to purchase a piece of land near the principle market, and erect a suitable station, which in process of time, by God's blessing, will probably become a great center of instruction and power for good among the people, and serve as a half-way house for us on our way to Stanley Pool and the further interior."—New York Independent.

—Mr. Robert Mackenzie in "The History of the Nineteenth Century" remarks: "There are few things in human history that were an aspect of higher moral grandeur than the opening of what are now our great missions. Among the glories of the century there is none greater than this. All other enterprises of beneficence must yield the palm to this magnificent attempt to expel debasing superstitions, and convey into every heart the ennobling influences of the Christian religion. The success already attained gives sure promise of results, the greatness of which we as yet but dimly perceive."

—A number of missionaries in China have sent a protest to Max Muller against the translation of the word Shang-ti in his book on the religions of China as God. Although missionaries agree that Shang-ti is the best term to be used by separating it from connection with the God of the Christian Bible, they are opposed to identifying the Shang-ti of the Chinese classics with the true God. Mr. Muller defends the translation, and calls upon the Missionaries to withdraw their charges.

—The Lucknow Witness says: "In a village near Bareilly recently ten adults and four children were baptised from heathenism. Two of them are shoemakers and the other cultivators and independent. These men have been instructed and brought forward chiefly by the students of the Bareilly Theological School. A number of others in the same place are preparing for baptism."

—Dr. Maclay in a letter dated Foochow, December 15th, reports himself as in improved health. He gives a good account of the work of the three missionary organizations—the Methodist Episcopal, American Board and Church Missionary Society in that important city.

—While Mohammedans controlled Bosnia the free circulation of the Bible was allowed, but since Roman Catholicism has had sway there, through Austrian supremacy, the circulation of the Scriptures has been forbidden.

—The American Congregationalists have appropriated $34,052 for missionary labor in Spain and Austria.

—Japanese authorities allow native but not foreign missionaries to preach in the prisons.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The Rev. David Macrae, who went out of the Scotch United Presbyterian Church on account of discord of views on eternal punishment, held recently a soiree in celebration of the first anniversary of his installation in his church at Dundee. The church, he said, had between 1,100 and 1,200 communicants, 600 scholars in Sunday-school, musical classes, and a Young Men's Association. Ministers of all the churches of every name had been invited to attend the reception, on the principle that those who profess to be followers of Christ, and to be Christians first and only denominationalists afterward, should, instead of cold-shouldering one another, recognize their fraternity and seek earnestly for some basis of practical co-operation in the war against sin and selfishness.—Methodist.

—Sunday, December 12th, was directed by the British Wesleyan Conference to be observed as "Temperance Sunday" in all the churches of the connection. A similar request was made for the year before, and was forgotten by the ministers, an illustration of which forgetfulness is humbly told that the National Temperance League went to the expense of engaging orators to attend our services, at which four of the most eminent members of the conference were advertised to preach. The reporters on their return announced that in no instance had either of those distinguished ministers made the slightest reference, either in prayer or in the sermon, to the subject of temperance. Pains were taken that no such catastrophe should occur this time, for a circular was sent to each minister reminding him of his duty.

—An organ has been put up in a small Irish Presbyterian Church in the suburbs of Belfast, and a great commotion in the church is expected to be the result. Harmoniums have hitherto caused trouble to the few churches that have tried to introduce them, but no one has ever before ventured to intrude a permanent organ upon the church. Notice has been served of an injunction, and the case will probably be taken to the Court of chancery.

—An Italian translation of the life of John Wesley has been sent to many of the public men of Italy, who have made hearty acknowledgments of pleasure they had in reading it. Signor Minghetti wrote that it seemed to him that the example of a life so noble and pure might be usefully proposed to the admiration and imitation of the Italians. Others also spoke in high terms of Wesley's life and work.

—The treasurers of the Bishops' Fund of the Methodist Episcopal Church remind the churches that since the first of January of the present year the entire support of the bishops is placed upon the churches; that 25 per cent. has been added to the apportionment of last year, on account of the four new bishops; that the treasury is empty; and that, unless action is taken promptly, the bishops will be in embarrassment.

—A French paper gives a list of the Catholic religious orders in France living under vow of poverty, with the value of their possessions in real estate. The Jesuits lie at the top with 12,000,000 francs, the Christian Brothers have property worth 31,000,000, the grand total being $21,000,000.

—A movement is on foot in the Episcopal churches to raise money to build a house of worship for Pere Hyacinthe in Paris. In order that M. Loyson may give his time wholly to preaching, it is proposed to raise $17,000 for the coming year, that assistants may be hired to do parochial work.

—Mr. Charles Wood, president of the English Church Union, a Ritualistic, has sent a letter expressing the sympathy of the Union with the French religious orders in the "persecution" they are suffering. He says that he represents twelve bishops, 2,500 clergymen, and 15,800 laymen.

—A sect of Bible Christians in Servia, who are called Nazareans, have long suffered, on account of their unwillingness to bear arms. Several of them are still in prison for this reason. All who have come in contact with them speak in praise of their honesty, loyalty, and earnest Christianity.

—The "Salvation Army" is rapidly increasing. It now reports 172 corps or stations, 363 officers, 222 buildings occupied. Sittings are provided for 141,900 persons. The total of contributions in 1880 was $88,345. The number of services held every week is 3,770.

—Fifty years ago North Carolina Baptists numbered only 15,000; now there are over 180,000. Then they gave little or nothing to benevolence; last year they gave $185,265 for the kingdom of Christ.

—Congregationalism is doing a good, strong work in the South. High grade schools have been established by the Congregational Home Mission Board in eight Southern States, under the charge of two hundred teachers. These schools at present have 8,000 colored students.

—Dean Church's address to the Archbishop of Canterbury, proposing to place the Ritualists on a footing of toleration in the Established Church, has been signed thus far by over 2,000 clergymen.

—The statistical returns of the New South Wales and Queensland Conferference, Australia, show an increase of 303 members during the year.

Our Young People.

ARE IT HAPPY HEART.

BY JENNIE E. CHENEY.

Little Charlie Happy-heart
Singing all the day,
Ever singing if at work;
Singing, too, at play.

Singing out his lessons,
Whether short or long,
Singing in the sunshine
Such a merry song:

Singing when it's cloudy,
With a face so bright,
That it's sure to lift our hearts
Full of cheery light;

Singing, always singing,
He so glad and gay,
While I the years have stolen
The songs I sang away.

But when the days seem hardest,
Whatever may go wrong,
It helps me so to listen
To his free and joyous song.

Thank God for such glad singing,
I whisper every day,
And then for little Happy-heart,
I lift my voice and pray,

That he who gave him being,
And filled his soul with song,
May bless the little singer
And lead his feet along;

Till one day he shall stand and sing
His songs where angels dwell;
What better could I ask for him—
The child we love so well?

—Watchman.

A Hiding Place.

"Children, shall I tell you a story?"

"Yes, indeed," cry the children; and Rob adds, with a flourish, "You bet!"

I caught his eye, and he looked somewhat ashamed. "That's what the boys all say, anyhow," he said.

"Does that mean any more than 'yes, indeed?'" I asked.

"N-no, sir."

"Does it sound better?"

"No, sir," a second time.

"Don't you think it is a coarse word?"

"Yes, sir," this unwillingly.

"Then please do not use the word again." So I and Rob having promised, I told my story.

"One day, as I was strolling through the woods with a friend, we came suddenly upon a partridge. A very lazy partridge it seemed to me, for as I turned toward it, it did not fly to get out of my way, but only moved off with a sort of a flying walk, keeping just in front of me, and going so slowly that once I could have seized it. All the chance of catching it had no surprised me that I let it slip.

"But so we discovered the meaning of its strange actions. It was trying to lure us away from a nestful of little ones whom it had left in the spot where we had first surprized it. There they were, huddled together, and looking up with bright little eyes which soon discovered us. In a moment all were hurrying away and were lost from view among the flowers and underbrush of the wood.

"All but one, that is. One little fellow stood still, and let us come close to him. Will you believe me? he had actually hidden himself behind a single blade of grass, and had crumbled down there as contentedly as possible. We could see his little eyes watching us, and if he could think, I dare say his thoughts were something like this:

"'They are very big. I am almost afraid. Mother is gone, and the others have run away frightened. But they can't see me, nor hurt me, I know. Look how big this blade of grass is!' And he gave his wee plumes a shake, as I suppose he had seen his mother do.

"I stooped down, and caught the little thing in my hand. It fluttered with fright for a minute, but finding my hand warm and soft, soon grew quiet and seemed to be happy.

"We heard the old partridge in a thicket near by, poor bird! with her tender heart beating loudly, no doubt, in fear and love for the little one; and so with a caress I put the baby partridge down. It scampered away very fast, and I dare say the old hen finally gathered up all her little chickens under her wings very thankful that the giants had spared every one to her."

The children's faces were bright and with sympathy for the partridge family and the little bird's hiding behind the blade of grass pleased them. I asked Rob, "Don't you think we may learn a lesson for ourselves in the hiding of the little bird?"

"I think I do, sir."

"And what is it?"

"Well, I think we must run to God to things which cannot keep us from harm."

"Yes, that is it," I said. "Suppose I had been cruel? The little bird would have lost its life. Just so with us. When temptation comes upon us, how often do we go behind some little excuse, some very weak one, at that, as to be better to hide than a blade of grass, and we think we shall be safe. But when sin seizes, it is always cruel, and means only to kill. We have nothing in ourselves to hide us but blades of grass."

Then Maurice said simply, "What are we to do?"

I asked, "What did the other partridge do?"

"Ran to real hiding places in the woods."

Rob thought a moment, and his face brightened.

"Isn't this the answer, sir, 'Thou art a place to hide me?' I remember the Psalms say so."

"Yes, my boy; and who is the Thou?"

"God." And the whisper in which the Holy Name was spoken showed that they all felt the force of the story.

Stop Before You Begin.

Success depends as much on not doing as upon doing; in other words, "Stop before you begin," has saved many a boy from ruin.

When quite a young lad I came very near losing my own life and that of my mother by the horse I was driving running violently down a steep hill and over a dilapidated bridge at its foot.

As the boards of the old bridge flew up behind us, it seemed almost miraculous that we were not precipitated into the stream beneath and drowned. Arriving home and relating our narrow escape to my father, he sternly said to me:

"Another time hold in your horse before you start."

How many young men would have been saved if in early life they had said, when invited to take the first step in wrong-doing:

"No, I thank you."

If John, at that time a clerk in the store, had only said to one of the older clerks, when invited to spend an evening in a drinking saloon, "No, I thank you," he would not to day be an inmate of an inebriate asylum.

If James, a clerk in another store, when invited to spend his next Sabbath on a steam-boat excursion, had said, "No, I thank you, the water is to me have been an honored officer in the church instead of occupying a cell in State prison.

Had William, when at school, said, when his comrade suggested to him that he write his own excuses for absence from school and sign his father's name, "No, I thank you; I will not add lying to wrong-doing," he would not to-day be serving out a term of years in prison for having committed forgery.

In my long and large experience as an educator of boys and young men, I have noticed this, that resisting the devil in whatever form he may suggest wrong-doing to us is one sure means of success in life. Tampering with evil is always dangerous.

"Avoid the beginning of evil," is an excellent motto for every boy starting out in life.

Oh, how many young men have endeavored, when half-way down the hill of wrong-doing to stop, but have not been able! Their own passions, appetites, lusts and bad habits have driven them rapidly down the hill to swift and irremediable ruin.

My young friend, stop before you begin to go down hill; learn now to say to all invitations to wrong-doing, from whatever source they may come, "No, I thank you," and, in your old age, glory-crowned, you will thank me for this advice.

DOING GOD'S ERRANDS.—Hester was a little girl who was trying to love and serve Jesus. And she showed her love for Jesus by seeking to please him in all she did. She loved to do errands for her mother, and to have her mother to say she was a faithful servant when she did them well.

One day she had been talking with her mother about God. As they got through, she looked up with a bright thought beaming in her eyes, and said:

"Why, mother, then God is sending us on errands all the time! Oh! it is so nice to think I am God's little errand-girl."

"Yes, dear," said her mother; "God has given us all errands to do for him, and plenty of time to do them in, and a book full of directions to show us how to do them. Every day we can tell him what we were trying to do, and ask him to help us. And when he calls us home to himself, we shall have great joy in telling him what we have been trying to do for him."

"I like that, Sair," said Hester. "It is very pleasant to be allowed to do errands for God."

"One of my errands," said her mother, "is to take care of you."

"And one of mine, dear mother, is to honor and obey you. I think God gives us very pleasant errands to do."

You know nothing makes us more happy than to do anything for a person that we love. This is what Jesus meant when he said, "My yoke is easy, my burden is light." This is what the Apostle John meant when he said that "His commandments are not grievous." His people love him for love, and that makes every thing they do for him light and pleasant to them.

JOHN NEWTON'S TWO HEAPS.—"I see in the world," said good old John Newton nearly a hundred years ago, "two heaps, one of misery, the other of happiness. It is but little I can do to take from one heap and add to the other, but let me do what I can. If a child has lost a half penny, and if by giving it another, I can wipe away its tears, I feel that I am doing something. I would gladly do a greater thing if I could, but let me do this little thing." In all this, John Newton was just following his Master, who "went about doing good." Let us all seek to have the same spirit in us.

Who is this young girl, so gently helping the poor lame boy up the steps at the Sabbath school door? We do not know. But we think we know something about her. "By their fruits ye shall know them;" and we know her by her fruits. She has the opportunity, and she is doing a little deed of kindness; so we are sure she has a kind heart within. That is the root, and this is the fruits.

Perhaps there are some of our readers who are one of them, who never did a kindness to anybody in their lives. They think of no one but self, their own praise, their own comfort, their own pleasure, their own profit. But there are others we know, who try, like John Newton, to be always taking a bit from the one heap and adding to the other. Among their brothers and sisters at home, among their companions at school, wherever they go, they are always trying to do or use and to show kindness to others.

Which of the two kinds of boys and girls are the happier? And which is the most like Christ? Children's Record.

LITTLE TAILORS.—Once there was a king who employed his people to work for him. The silk and patterns were all given by the king. He told the workers that when any difficulty arose they should send to him, and never to fear troubling him.

Among men and women busy at their looms was one little child, whom the king did not think too young to work. Often alone at her work, cheerfully and patiently she labored. One day, when the men and women were distressed at the sight of their failures, the silks were tangled, and the weaving unlike the pattern, they gathered round the child and said: "Tell us how it is that you are so happy in your work. We are always in difficulties."

"Then why do you not send to the king?" said the little weaver; "he told us that we might do so."

"So we do, night and morning."

"Ah," said the child, "but I send directly if I find I have a little tangle."

So let us take all our wants and troubles directly to the Lord in prayer. He invites us to do so, and promises to help us.

PART OF THE CONCERN.—A clergyman on his way to a missionary-meeting overtook a boy, and asked him about the road, and where he was going.

"Oh!" he said, "I'm going to the meeting to hear about the missionaries."

"Missionaries!" said the minister, "What do you know about missionaries."

"Why," said the boy, "I'm part of the concern. I've got a missionary-box, and I always go to the missionary-meeting. I belong."

Every child should feel that he is "part of the concern," and that his work is just as important as that of any one else. Linch pins are little things; but, if they drop out, the wagon it very likely to come to a stand-still. Every pin and screw should be in working-order, and every child should be able to say, "I always go to missionary-meeting. Why, I'm part of the concern."

An Old Objection to Missions.

An article in one of our secular dailies recently, called our attention to the old and threadbare objection to foreign missions, that these lead to the neglect of the religiously destitute at home. The tone of the article was fair and sincere, and doubtless expresses the convictions of many benevolent people who are friendly to the spread of the gospel.

An answer, in part, to this objection is that the people in Christian lands have the gospel. There are what are called the neglected classes, and there are masses not much influenced by the direct teachings of the gospel. But the churches and Sunday-schools are open to them, Bibles and tracts are systematically distributed among them, and ministers, missionaries and religious men and women are moving about in contact with them. If any are ignorant of Christ and of the teachings of Christianity, it is for the most part their own fault. All who desire a Bible have one; all who are willing to hear the gospel may hear it. With the heathen it is different. They have no Bibles, and they are without a divine revelation. If large masses of people at home choose to reject the gospel, this is no good reason why the church should withhold it from the millions of pagans who have no gospel privileges whatever. Such a course on the score of benevolence would be criminal rather than praiseworthy.

We most heartily second all efforts to call sinners to repentance at home, and to search out and urge the gospel upon the poor, ignorant and vicious in our large cities. But, at the worst, their opportunities are incomparably better than those of the heathen. No amount of effort or expenditure can save all in any locality. The duty of the church is, as far as possible, to give the gospel to all. It cannot compel nor assure its acceptance. It is manifest that, were we to wait until all the heathen at home were saved, we should never move beyond the limits of our Christian civilization. Had this principle been adopted by the apostles and the Primitive Church, we should be heathen ourselves, and Christ would never have been preached outside of Jerusalem and Palestine. Paul, in that case, would never have set foot on the soil of Macedonia. Peter would never have gone to Babylon, and Rome, Greece and Britain would never have heard of the Saviour. When the Saviour commands his apostles and the church to go into all the world and to preach the gospel to every creature, he meant that they should go. As Peter, John and Paul, under inspiration, interpreted this commission, and went abroad, before the people at home were Christianized, so may we.

What is possible may be done at home at the same time that Christ is preached abroad. The evangelization of the world is a work of time, and it is important that the work of preparation should be going on in many places at once. The gospel is as seed sown, and, being sown at home, it would be a cruel waste of time to wait for the harvest in one field before breaking ground and sowing in another. Our gardeners know that it would be folly to wait for the maturity of one vegetable before planting another. Between the one and the other there is no conflict, but each is coming forward in its own order, and swelling the aggregate profit. Cotton planters tell us that a fair amount of corn can be made without interfering with the cotton. While the cotton is being planted the corn is already up and growing, and the two cultures go on side by side without hindrance to either. The church can do what is possible at home, in both sowing and reaping, and it can at the same time be sowing gospel seed in heathen countries.

The Christian Church is not doing its duty at home nor abroad, but there is no conflict between the two. It is a matter of fact that when the Protestant Churches had no foreign missions the masses at home were the most neglected. For proof we have only to compare the religious condition of England in the eighteenth century with its religious condition in the present century. The same life, that stirs Christian men to seek the destitute at home, also moves them to go to those who are perishing in heathen lands. It is a fact that the more the churches are imbued with the missionary spirit the more faithful, zealous and liberal they are in supplying the people with the gospel at home. Some choose to explain that this is a reactionary influence that comes from the work of foreign missions. It may be so, but we account for it rather on the ground that all Christian work has its source in the one element of spiritual life, and that where this life burns in the heart the whole sphere of duty is embraced. If taught by the precepts and examples of the New Testament, and imbued with the Spirit of Christ, no Christian can resist the convictions and impulses of missionary work.

As for foreign missions being a failure, our answer, in part, is that the revival of religion at home usually keeps pace with our missionary zeal; and, further, that in proportion to money expended, and all agencies employed, the success of the gospel is greater in foreign missions than it is at home. How can any one acquainted with what has been accomplished within the last fifty years say that foreign missions are a failure? A glance at the islands of the Pacific, Madagascar, India and China, refutes the assertion. Within this period thousands and hundreds of thousands have been brought to Christ. But if this were not so, and if with little apparent fruit, our mission work were only a work of preparation and of seed-sowing, still it would be a great success as laying the foundations for the future conquest of the world to Christ. Foreign missions are successful, but if, according to our judgment, it were otherwise, still the duty of the church is clear to go into all the world, and to preach the gospel of the kingdom as a witness to all nations.

The event of greatest interest to the nation this week is the inauguration of the new President. The ceremony itself, of administering the oath of office and of the delivery of the customary inaugural address, is all very simple, but the accessories are to be of the most imposing character. The arrangements for the inauguration of Mr. Garfield are on a scale of magnificence which exceed any hitherto made on a like occasion. The military, volunteer, State and national, under the command of the General of the United States army, is to be a prominent and rather ominous feature of the display. Its purpose is, of course, to honor the incoming President, and to impress the whole country, and the world, by a pageant whose brilliancy and splendor shall be worthy of the greatness, wealth and power of the nation.

But the people are thus becoming accustomed to the presence of armed men on this great civic occasion, and the time may come when the General of the army will be there as something more than the mere figure head of a grand gala display, and when the presence of the soldiers will be for a purpose which threatens the liberties of the people. Republican simplicity is among the traditions of the past. No contrast could well be greater than that between the inauguration of Jefferson and Garfield. The country has grown immensely great and rich since the former quietly rode up to the Capitol, amid no parade of soldiers or other unusual surroundings, and swore to obey the constitution and to administer the laws.

Nations are like individuals. Style and display are the inseperable attendants of prosperity and wealth. They put on airs and sport sumptuous equipages, because they can afford it, and because it is the manner of the world. As yet we have a court only in the bud, but this will doubtless grow, and a government supported and controled by wealth must become more and more conformed to the aristocratic establishments of the older nations. Less display, less eclat, less fuss and ado every way, at the inauguration of our Presidents, would be more in keeping with our democratic institutions, and would afford a better promise for the future of the country.

What sort of a President Mr. Garfield will make remains to be seen. He is a more brilliant and an abler man than Mr. Hays, but probably not a better man. In the present shape of our politics he is bound to administer the government, and wield its vast patronage first of all for the advantage and to maintain the ascendency of the Republican party. A Democratic President would probably do the same for his party. But beyond partizan exigencies we have hope that Mr. Garfield will be the President of the whole people, and that his administration will be characterized by a vigorous, broad and just statesmanship. The parties will be so nearly equal in the Senate, and the Republican majority so small in the House, that no very oppressive or extreme legislation affecting the interests of the South is likely to be adopted. There is no feeling in the South but that of loyalty to the constitution, and there is no desire to revive or to perpetuate sectional animosity. If this new administration does not mark the complete restoration of good will, as between the sections, it will be the fault of Mr. Garfield and his advisers.

In our anxiety for a revival we are disposed to look at the coldness and worldliness of those around us, and to watch for the signs of times of refreshing in some general movement. We forget that we may have a revival in our own hearts, and that however it may be with others, the Saviour will come into us whenever we hear his voice and open the door. The kingdom does not come with observation. It is within us if anywhere, and, while we may not command a general and sweeping awakening, we may at any time, for ourselves, have a Pentecostal shower. If we feel the need of a revival, why do we not have one—in ourselves? The church needs it, and the world needs it, but, first of all, we must feel that we need it ourselves.

We do not know what God may be pleased to do for others. Besides conditions and means, there may be a sovereignty in what we call revivals. At all times there is grace enough, and enough of the Spirit abroad, to save all who wish to be saved. But, if there are means that assure a revival, these means center in the state of the individual heart. The revival works from forces within; it is born in the renewed life of the individual believer, and in the baptisms of the closet and of secret prayer. The spirit of grace and supplication must first be poured out upon the few who wait for the consolation of Israel. The revival must first exist in the heart of the pastor, and in the hearts of faithful ones, who are agonizing for a deeper work of grace in themselves. It is often the case that those who publicly complain of the deadness of the church, and are ready to censure everybody else, are themselves the dryest and most withered of all the branches of the vine. They are looking about and saying lo here, and lo there, without once turning their thoughts within, and realizing that they are themselves parched and shriveled, and ready to die.

Let each Christian determine to have a revival in himself, to open his own heart to the Saviour, who knocks and wails, and to claim the promised fulness of the Spirit. If others will not drink, let him come himself to the clear and brimming river of the waters of life, and take freely of the abundant stream of grace. We do not say that this will bring about a general revival, but it will at least be a revival of one soul, and this may lead to a wider manifestation of gospel power. It is certain that a full salvation for ourselves, and an overflowing cup of experimental religion, do not depend upon a general revival. Having these, however, the other is almost sure to come.

Success.

The measure of the success of any work is determined by the specific object proposed to be attained. If the proposed end is reached the work is a success. In order to estimate the success of a Christian life, the legitimate object of such a life must be kept in view. The catechism informs us correctly what this object is. "The chief end of man is to glorify God;" that is, to make God glorious—to illustrate his glory before men. Jesus explains how this is to be done. "Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit." Christian positivity, then, is absolutely essential to a Christian life. It is here, as it is elsewhere, earnestness is work is the condition of success. The means of grace all converge to this point, and they meet only here. Hence the man who would reach the highest power must be a man of stirring activity. None of the graces of religion can be properly developed without this activity. No man can pray "the effectual, fervent prayer" until he has come into the direst extremity. It is only when a man is doing his best in the work assigned him that his prayers will be prayers of faith. A man does not get into the line of God's promises until he reaches this point. God's word nowhere promises rewards for indolence. Success in the Christian life points back to an intense earnestness, accompanied by weariness and discouragement and heart-ache. The condition of success is work, work, work. Individual action brought into line with church action, and a "long pull and a strong pull and a pull all together," will achieve wonders. Fruit-bearing—doing good to the souls and bodies of men—is the thing that glorifies God. If we desire to grow as Christians, if we want the church to "arise and shine," if we wish the Sunday-school prosperous and the prayer meeting to become the ante-chamber of God's eternal house, we must work with an undaunted will and an unweariable patience. Christ says: "Go," and "I am with you always."

Scylla and Charybdis.

The via media is the safest way in matters of religion, as well as in matters secular. Extremists realize little, and accomplish little good.

When the Church of Rome had reached the lowest depths of corruption, authorizing harlequin Tetzel to traverse Switzerland and Germany as a seller of indulgences, having at his disposal many thousand letters of pardon, signed in blank by the Pope, in order to secure sufficient means with which to complete that costly church edifice, St. Peter's, the extremes of ecclesiastical secularization had been reached. Disgust and contempt were the unavoidable outcome. Tetzel conveyed his papal letters of indulgence, together with a large cedar box containing the vast sums of money readily paid in by the ignorant for said letters, on a wagon drawn by four horses. On the outside of this box he had written the sacreligious words:

"As soon as your money responds in our treasure You will be blessed of God without measure."

It was near my native village that Tetzel was one day accosted by a German nobleman, bent on punishing the papal patroon. He pretended contritely to confess his sins hitherto committed. It required several hundred ducats to secure a papal letter of pardon for the same. Having paid for his sins already committed, the nobleman suggested that he was rich, that probably in the near future he would commit other crimes, perhaps robbery and maltreatment of priests; may be that Tetzel could give him, for an appropriate remuneration, a letter of pardon for his future sins. To this the unscrupulous priest consented; a thousand ducats paid by the nobleman completed the iniquitous bargain. But on the following night this same nobleman, assisted by some brave peasants, attacked Tetzel and party in their camp, took away all the money, burned up all blank letters of pardon, and whipped the wicked leader mercilessly. The money removed to a place of safety, the whipping thoroughly administered, the nobleman showed Tetzel the letter of pardon, and left him to meditate upon the meaning of "Out-Heroding Herod."

It was, beyond all doubt, such shameless extortion, such pious fraud perpetrated by the Pope's emissary, that prepared the Germans for Luther's reformation.

If we will not drive away from our churches the deeply pious, the sincere followers of the Lamb, we must stem the flood of worldliness that threatens to extinguish true spirituality. We are not called to build up large congregations, popular churches, but to save souls.

But the opposite extreme is equally pernicious. Avoiding Scylla, many fall into Charybdis. That was a promising work, in the seventeenth century, in Spain and France, called into life by that devoted priest, Michael Molinos, a Spaniard. His book, "Guida Spirituala," gave the first impetus to that truly evangelical movement known in church history as quietism. The adherers of this movement held that by faith in Christ the heart would be supernaturally changed, and thus be a sure domicile of celestial peace and quiet. Quietism was derived from the Latin quies rest. Fear would no longer torment conscience. Perfect love had cast out fear forever. The soul had found a safe anchorground.

This, as appears, is the biblical doctrine of assurance which we, as Methodists, now teach, and which, from happy experience, we know to be true.

Many Spaniards and Frenchmen adhered to it, even that devoted man of God, Fenelon. Fenelon's advocacy of quietism, &c., that a man baptized with the Holy Spirit, and with fire, can have a conscious assurance of his acceptance with God, led Pope Innocent XII to anathematize his writings, and Louis XIV to discharge him from his court. What could now hinder the spread of biblical holiness? Though Fenelon's writings were under the ban, he himself was still, and to his death, Archbishop.

It was again the extremists who rendered the spread of quietism impossible. One of the converts was the beautiful and sanguine Madame Guyon, at the court of Louis XIV. A more devoted Christian never bore the yoke of Christ; but being excessively imaginative, and her enthusiasm discarding the safe rudder of reason, she soon fell into grave error. Before her error became manifest, Fenelon thought much of her, endorsed her, and even attended her prayer meetings. But, owing to her imaginative preponderance, the sublime was soon reduced to the ridiculous. At length she imagined herself the woman mentioned in the Apocalyps xii, 2, asserting that she was at times so excessively filled with the Holy Ghost as to be unable to contain herself in her usual attire. She was several times incarcerated, and died a heart-broken [illegible]. Her demise quietism was buried.

If we will not drive away from our churches the true believers and blood-washed children of God, we must not tolerate the censorious harangues of a few chronically fault-finding professors, whose higher life, manifestly, is one of profession and not of practice.

RECOLLECTIONS REVIVED.

BY REV. THOMAS V. RAMSAY.

MR. EDITOR: The weekly visits of your dear old ADVOCATE continually remind me of past events, and revive recollections of associations with dear friends of a former period in life, especially the communications of Bros. Grace and Rush in your last issue.

I have commenced my thirty-eighth year in the ministry, and what changes have taken place in that time! In looking over the list of those who were members of the Alabama Conference when I was received on trial but few remain. But one or two of that number, I believe, are still on the effective list, while I remember one or two in other Conferences. And but two of the class of thirty who joined with me are still there—Bros. Bhu and Barker.

Bro. Grace joined eight years after I did, with a class of great promise, several of whom are now occupying prominent positions like himself. It was then, as it is now, one of the strongest Conferences in the connection. Two of our present Bishops commenced their itinerant career in that Conference, and another was a member of it when elected to the episcopacy.

Bro. Rush came in at a later day. I was the pastor of his parents one year, when he was a boy, and two better people I never knew than "Uncle" Charlie Rush and his wife. They were as father and mother to the young and inexperienced pastor and wife, and many a pleasant day have we spent under their hospitable roof. We will meet them again over the river.

Bro. Rush mentions the name of my dear old friend, Dr. Mitchell, that noble veteran who has passed his threescore years and ten, but is still battling in the Redeemer's cause. For nearly three years I was intimately associated with him as teacher in Centenary Institute, at Summerfield, where a friendship was formed between us which will last forever. I was there at the time Bro. Grace speaks of being there on his way to Conference, at Marion, but did not attend that session of the Conference. Summerfield was a sort of center of Methodism in Alabama at that time, and there were gathered there some of the noblest spirits in the land of both the ministry and the laity. The gifted and lamented Barrabee was also one of the teachers in the Institute, where my acquaintance with him commenced, and an intimate friendship formed, which will be renewed in the world to come. It would occupy too much space to mention the names of so many precious loved ones of that day who filled conspicuous places in the vineyard of the Lord, most of whom have gone to reap their reward. My memory sometimes reverts to the history of the last thirty years, and, in the various fields of labor to which I have been assigned, it seems to me the majority have passed away.

Here and there may be found one who lingers as a relict of the past generation, connecting links between the present and past. My venerable father, for instance, familiarly known to all the members of the Conference, having been a lay delegate to every Conference but one since lay delegation was introduced. A Methodist from boyhood, he is perhaps now the oldest in our connection, if not in the world. He is now just entering his eighty-sixth year, and has recently passed through a deep affliction in the death of my stepmother, a good Presbyterian woman, who made him a good wife in his old age. And about five days after her death he received intelligence of the death of a son in Texas, whom he had not seen in many years. Let me invoke, in his behalf, the prayers of Christian friends.

I seldom see anything in your paper from our Conference. I think I may say we are still prospering under the Divine blessing. It is true we report a small decrease in our membership last year, owing to several causes; for instance, a large emigration from portions of our State last fall, and a more careful revision of our lists by some pastors, a matter too much neglected by some, and we did not have the great revival influence in our bounds last year that we did the year before.

Although this year, so far, has been the most unfavorable, on account of the weather, I ever saw, yet I think I may say it opens auspiciously. The preachers who had to move have had a terrible time, but in the Grenada district they are all at their post, and well received by the people, and I believe are honestly striving to do their duty.

We missed you, Mr. Editor, at our last Conference. We had one of the most remarkable sessions for the outpouring of the Spirit I ever witnessed. Our people are waking up on the subject of temperance. We feel that our last Legislature put us in a worse condition than we were before by the enactment of the pint law. We are determined to have a change. Do you not think it would be well for the temperance people to hold a State convention, and define their position in reference to the next political campaign in this State? This is the year for our State elections, and moral people have as much right to representation in the councils of the State as anybody else.

Hence I say to the friends of temperance throughout Mississippi, let us have a State convention, and organize as they are doing in other States.

I fear, Mr. Editor, you will think this communication too long. Pardon me, for it is not often that I trouble you. God bless you and the dear old ADVOCATE, and give you many more years of usefulness.

EDGEWATER SPRINGS, MISS., Feb. 22, 1881.

Note by the Editor.—The only reassure we have for Bro. Ramsey is that he writes so seldom. Please write again, and soon.

The Coming Congress.

The Watchman, London, writing of the Ecumenical, under the above caption, says:

Perhaps scarcely any meeting held in 1881 will possess for the Methodist world such deep interest as the Ecumenical Methodist Congress, which is to assemble in City Road Chapel. Congress, our friends will kindly note, not Council or Convention. Most fitly will it assemble in Wesley's own chapel, and near to the resting-place where in 1791 his remains were laid. Ten years more would complete the century from the date of his death; but no one would wish the Congress delayed ten years for a merely symmetrical reason. Ninety years, three generations, have passed, and universal Methodism is not content to wait longer for this grand opportunity for the interchange of mutual recognition and sympathy. So, with a Methodist Lord Mayor fitly and worthily presiding over the great city of our land, the Congress will assemble in September. There will doubtless be a goodly contingent from across the Atlantic; our American friends have already matured their traveling arrangements. And men brown with tropical suns will meet men who spend their lives amid almost perpetual snows, drawn by the attraction of a common interest in the welfare of Methodism. We will not hazard any guess as to how many lands and languages will be represented at the Congress, for Methodism has now a footing in China and Japan, while it holds no mean place in South Africa and Polynesia. No pomp or state will mark the gathering of this representative assembly, nor will any true-hearted Methodist desire them; but its remarkable character will give it an intrinsic importance to which mere ceremonial grandeur would be an addition. How wonderfully in three generations has the great religious movement designated as Methodism extended! At the close of Wesley's death there were 312 preachers and 76,000 members of Society. To-day in Great Britain alone we reckon 14,000 Church members, including those "on trial" and 1,200 ministers; while the general statistics of Methodism, comprehending as far as possible its branches in all countries, report no less than 1,675,000 Church members and 31,100 ministers. And this, be it remembered, is the unfinished aspect of our work, presenting its lowest rather than its highest figures; a fact which our enemies seem rather carefully to ignore. Scholars in our schools and regular worshippers in our congregations do not enter into these returns. What additions should be made to the foregoing figures under each of these most important heads? One single fact is very suggestive, viz., that on Sunday afternoons there is an average attendance of half-a-million scholars in our Sunday-schools in Great Britain. And the numbers on the books are of course far above the average attendance even in the most successful school. The scholars amount in fact to nearly double the Society membership in our home circuits. This being the case, and according to our official statistics it is so, what addition should be made for stated worshippers who are not members or scholars? If the scholars are to the Society as two to one, it seems a very reasonable and moderate computation that the total adherents of Methodism, members, scholars and hearers, throughout the world, should be estimated at not less than twenty millions. We are not boasting. The Congress will not assemble to boast, but rather to say, reverently and thankfully, "What hath God wrought!" And this great communion—too great now to be ignored save by the narrowest prejudice—is organized with a minuteness of which those outside its working can only judge imperfectly. The gap which in Wesley's days existed between the quarterly meetings and the Conference is now filled by a system of district meetings, the importance of which is rendered more and more evident by the developement of Methodism. Several of these are larger than was Wesley's average Conference; they deal with the disciplinary, financial, and administrative working of Methodism; the lay element enters largely into their composition, and their Connectional value as opportunities of stimulus, oversight, and regulation is simply inestimable. But ninety years have not only witnessed extension and organization, but wonderful development: Training Colleges for young ministers, others for Day-school teachers, large provision for education, primary, advanced, and, at length, happily, for middle-class education also—these things tend both to consolidation and advance, provide for the future as well as the present. Wesley laid but the barest rudiments of these things, which have become matters of course to his followers of to-day. The great Missionary Society, too, has been added to agencies for good which Methodism has been permitted to set in operation. There has been also some amount of modification, especially in regard to the itinerancy. There are not now three counties in a circuit, nor even one. It was not only inevitable, but in every way desirable, that in time ministerial labor should be more concentrated than was possible in the earlier days of Methodism. The large circuits of to-day consist, say, of a county town, with from twelve to twenty surrounding villages. But the large towns are themselves divided into seven or eight circuits, while in several London circuits there are only two chapels and two ministers. In America and some of the colonies one minister has charge of a single congregation, at least in the large cities. Nor is this the limit of variety. The Methodism of the United States is chiefly Episcopal, while in England Episcopacy is practically the most energetic and resolute antagonist of Methodism. In America meeting in class is frequently optional, while in Great Britain it is the sole test of membership. But the variation has not excluded the least doctrinal change, no development, no modification has taken place here. Divisions, some of them serious and painful enough, have taken place during the ninety years, but they have arisen upon questions of disciplinary questions, not upon points of doctrine. What we as a Church hold to be the great essential truths of Christianity are believed and preached now as in Wesley's own days! His Notes on the New Testament and his fifty-three sermons are still our doctrinal standards, solemnly accepted by every minister and preferred by the trustees of every chapel. So distinct is the determination to adhere to Wesley's models that when his Hymn-Book was recently revised to meet the wants of our own times no material change was made in this part of the work. The new hymns were added, not incorporated, and the original book stands very nearly as he left it. The doctrinal steadfastness of Methodism is among its most marked characteristics. Nor have its religious methods changed. Prayer-meetings and revival services are to-day at once evidences of spiritual life and means of perpetuating it. The Congress which will assemble in the autumn will not be invited to sanction new methods or to promulgate new dogmas, any more than to discard those now and long since accepted. It will doubtless be a valuable opportunity for Methodists from all lands to cheer and stimulate each other; but it will also be an occasion for declaring a staunch loyalty to the traditions of the past. And the best friends of Methodism outside of its own pale, the earnest and spiritually minded members of other churches, desire nothing better for Methodism than that it should continue to be what it has been, and to do the work that it has done during the past ninety years.

Dr. Watkins' Last Hours.

Thomas L. Mellen, Esq., writing from Natchez, Miss., February 12, says:

"Let me thank you for your touching tribute to the memory of our noble brother, Dr. Watkins. It has been a long time since I mourned the death of any one as I now mourn for him. To me he was ever as kind and considerate, and even more confiding than a father is usually to a son. I enjoyed more of his wise counsels and personal confidence than any one outside of his own desolate family. By their request, and his own appointment, I will soon begin an extended memoir of his life and his labors. It will be a sad yet loving task, and I hope to prepare something worthy of the man whom you and I and so many others loved so well. His private papers and memoranda will be sent to me at an early date.

"A letter from his son, the Rev. A. Watkins, received this morning, tells me of the closing scene in these words: 'He died at half-past one o'clock on Saturday, the fifth instant. Perfectly rational to the last, he knew that the end was approaching. He was in my arms, his head resting upon my shoulders. Just before he expired he said: 'Lower my head a little, and let me go.' And thus, without pain and without murmur, he fell asleep in Jesus, as sweetly, as gently as a child falls asleep upon its mother's bosom.

Rev. John E. Edwards, writing to the Southern Christian Advocate, February 10, says:

Arrangements have been made with our Publishing House in Nashville, for the early issue of a volume of Bishop Haygood's Sermons. Dr. Summers has consented—a thing to be expected of him as our Book Editor—to see the Sermons through the press. I will, in a few days from the present, forward to him a considerable number of sermons, and full outlines of sermons, from which he will select a suitable number, with an eye to variety, to make up a volume of moderate size, in liberal type holding in hand a reserve for a second volume, which will consist of sermons, lectures and addresses, including the Bishop's popular and oft-requested address on the "Progress of Methodism in the Nineteenth Century."

The Southern Christian Advocate of February 26 says:

Bishop Wightman continues to improve. We are in better hopes of his permanent restoration than we have been since his illness commenced.

—We have commenced the publication of the Sunday school lessons. This we have declined to do hitherto for lack of space, and because we believed that our Nashville publications, prepared by our very competent Sunday-school secretary, supplied all that was necessary. Quite a number of our subscribers, however, have expressed the desire that we should publish the lessons, and we yield to this desire. We shall continue the publication for a time, and permanently if we find it worth while, and can continue to secure the aid of a fit man to prepare the copy. Rev. Christian Keener has kindly consented to do this work. He is a capable and good expositor, and his notes on the lessons will be both instructive and entertaining. The lessons will appear sufficiently in advance to enable all of our readers to have the paper in hand before the date for which the lesson is designed. We trust that our Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, as well as all of our pastors and members, will work for the ADVOCATE and take a personal interest in extending its circulation.

—Our Methodist Churches in New Orleans seem to be doing pretty well. Dr. Mathews at St. Charles Avenue has good congregations, and plans are forward for prayers nearly every Sunday night. Dr. Carter, at Felicity street, has met with a cordial reception and is preaching with great acceptability to a full house. Bro. Hill, at Carondelet street, is getting his work well in hand, and his charge seems to be entering upon a career of unwonted prosperity. Bro. Beard, at Moreau street, is greatly encouraged by the improvement in his congregation and Sunday School. At Louisiana Avenue, Bro. Keener reports his congregations as considerably better than last year.

We were over at Algiers last Sunday, and were gratified at the size and appearance of the Sunday-school, and also at the attendance at the morning preaching. The veteran pastor, Rev. Lewis A. Reed, is working faithfully, and in hope. It is a good time now to pray and labor for a general revival. It is greatly needed, and it seems to us that the set time to favor Zion has come.

Last Sunday the day was consecrated in New Orleans by imposing and noisy military demonstrations in the reception of military bodies from New York. It is a pity that the arrival and the reception ceremonies could not have fallen on some other day. Our Northern friends, however, seem to pay as little respect to the Sabbath as their Southern hosts. The churches on Sunday were generally pretty full, the congregations being swelled by visitors from abroad. The streets and clubs and places of amusements were also crowded. As we write, the streets are packed with a moving and gazing multitude. Rex has come and the display is more elaborate and wonderful than in other years. After the night spectacle of the Mistic Krewe and the balls and entertainments wind up, there will be a time of comparative quiet and peace during the forty days of Lent.

Rev. S. H. Werlein, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Houston, Texas, has been spending a few days with his friends and kinfolks in New Orleans. We were glad to see him in excellent health and as full of life and sunshine as ever. We learn that his work in Houston is prospering; a handsome new parsonage has recently been completed there, and it is contemplated at an early day to build a new church or to reconstruct the old. Bro. Werlein preached at St. Charles Avenue on Sunday morning last, and at his old charge, Louisiana Avenue, at night.

—We were very glad to have a call this week from W. H. Gayle, proprietor of the Monroe Bulletin, Monroe, Louisiana. We learn from him that a new Methodist Church will be built in Monroe this year. Rev. B. F. White is at his post and has entered hopefully upon his work. Bro. Gayle informs us, also, that Jay Gould has bought the railroad franchise from Monroe to Shreveport, and that the road will be rapidly built.

—We trust it is not too late to congratulate our brother, Rev. Felix G. Hocutt, presiding elder of Alexandria district, Louisiana Conference, on his marriage, in December last, to Miss Elvira E. Bryant, of Baton Rouge. Rev. Christian Keener officiated on the interesting occasion, December 28, 1880. We wish our friends a bright and prosperous career, and that upon them may ever rest the fulness of wedded bliss.

—Rev. George M. Liverman, pastor on the Caddo Circuit, Keachie, Louisiana, passed through the city last week. He represents that the mud is not yet dried in that region, and that church work, and farm work, also, are greatly hindered. In spite of the inclement weather they are building a new church at one of his appointments, Belle Bower, and it will soon be ready for dedication.

—Bishop Keener and Dr. Wilson reached this city, on their return from Mexico, Monday evening, February 28. Dr. Wilson left early Tuesday morning for Nashville. We have not seen the Bishop, nor did we get a glimpse of Dr. Wilson, and have nothing to report concerning their trip.

—We regret to learn that Miss Anna Shores, daughter of Rev. J. W. Shores of the Alabama Conference, has recently died at the home of her parents in Anniston, Ala. We tender our condolence to the bereaved family. A tribute of respect from the Sunday school of which she was a beloved and valuable member will appear in the next issue of the Advocate.

—Rev. C. W. Chatfield died at Newton, Mississippi, February 8. Bro. Chatfield had been, for several years, a member of the Mississippi Conference, but was local at the time of his death. He was a good and useful man. He died in great peace. An obituary notice of him will appear in the ADVOCATE next week.

—Rev. James S. Ervin, of the North Carolina Conference, died suddenly at King's Mountain, North Carolina, February 16, 1881.

—Rev. T. E. Sewell of the Arkansas Conference died at Parks Springs, Ark., February 6, 1881.

EAST MISSISSIPPI FEMALE COLLEGE.—On the proposed new building the trustees wish to begin work early in April. A good part of the money is in hand. It is important that all should be in the treasury. Friends who have subscribed will please make arrangements to pay immediately. More will be needed than the present aggregate of cash and subscriptions. Persons, therefore, who have not contributed can do so now most opportunely.

Remittances should be made to Rev. R. J. Jones, Meridian, Miss. Subscribers and others can either remit to Bro. Jones or send money through the preachers of the Conference, who are hereby requested to collect and forward for the college.

JOHN A. ELLIS, Agent.

Rev. John A. B. Jones, president of Port Gibson Female Academy, Port Gibson, Miss., writing February 11, says: "Prospects flattering for the publication, at an early date, of 'History of Methodism in the Mississippi Conference.' One brother notified me by last mail that he had obtained twenty subscribers during rainy day calls. Our term examination closed the eighth, examination rigid. Pupils acquitted themselves with honor. We enter upon this term of five months very much encouraged. Will very soon begin work on buildings to prepare for enlarged patronage."

NOT UNANIMOUS.—At the last session of the Alabama Conference a resolution was adopted, by vote, pledging the members of the Conference to pay a certain per cent. to the missionary cause out of their salaries. It was, I think, stated in your paper that the vote was unanimous. The same mistake is made in our published minutes. It was not unanimous.

A. CARUTHERS.

NOTICE.—Mrs. H. J. Hunter's address is West Point, Ga. Will the brother who received her appropriation forward the same to her at that point.

Books and Periodicals.

"Sermons by Southern Methodist Preachers," just issued by the Southern Methodist Publishing House at Nashville, is a 12 mo. of 407 pages and contains the following sermons: The World in the Church, by Bishop Pierce. The First and the Last, by Bishop Wightman. Joy in Heaven Over Penitent Sinners, by the Rev. Edward Wadsworth, A. M., D. D. Alabama Conference. All for God, by the Rev. W. T. Rolling, Western Virginia Conference. Inquiry and Invitation: Or, Philip's Philosophy, by the Rev. J. B. McCloheé, A. M., South Georgia Conference. The Things Prepared for Them that Love God, by the Rev. Linus Parker, D. D., Louisiana Conference. Piro Religiosi, by the Rev. H. Pearce Walker, D. D., Kentucky Conference. The Supreme Aim of Life, by the Rev J. D. Blackwell, Virginia Conference. The Last Enemy, by the Rev. W. T. Harris, Memphis Conference. The Spread of the Gospel, by the Rev S. A. Steel, North Mississippi Conference. The Hinderances of the Gospel, by the Rev. A. W. Mangum, D. D., North Carolina Conference. Christian Communism, by the Rev. M. Calloway, A. M., D. D., North Georgia Conference. The Intelligence of Faith, by the Rev. T. J. Heidt, D. D., Vanderbilt University. Faith in Christ, by Bishop Paine. Lessons from the Baptism of Jesus by John the Baptist, by the Rev. H. C. Settle, D. D., Louisville Conference. Future Rewards and Punishments by Bishop Kavanaugh. Christ and his Work, by the Rev. A. A. Lipscomb, D. D., LL. D., Vanderbilt University. The Great Awakening, by the Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, D. D., Editor of the Christian Advocate. Life Lost and Found, by the Rev. John C. Granberry, D. D., Vanderbilt University. Price $1 25, retail. Usual discounts.

We have not read more than three or four of these sermons. But with the topics and authors given our readers will rightly and safely conclude that we have in the volume many very able and edifying sermons, and that the book is well worth buying. Bishop Pierce's sermon on "The World in the Church" is timely, and deals especially with daring, as it deserves to be dealt with. Our pastors could hardly do better than to read it to their Congregations. The Sermon on "Faith in Christ" is perhaps the best sermon in the book, and it is a fair sample of the preaching of our venerable senior Bishop. It is broad, deep, strong, comprehensive, and the thought and argument are clothed in a diction of remarkable purity and grace. We say this is perhaps the best, but we have not read all, nor is it our purpose to institute particular comparisons. We are deeply impressed with the merits of the Sermons by Drs. Wadsworth, Dodd, Episcopal, Granberry and Fitzgerald.

It will be seen that there is variety in the subjects, and of course the style and method are as varied as the personality of the different preachers. Very appropriately the frontispiece is a handsome steel engraving of Bishop Paine. There are also photo-gravures of several others, rather frightful pictures to our mind, but they will give the reader some notion of those whom they represent. The Work may be ordered from the Publishing House, Nashville, and is for sale by Lathrop and Wilkins, 112 Camp street, New Orleans.

Scribner's Monthly, for March, is unusually lively, and altogether a remarkably interesting number. Among the more important articles are: In London with Dickens, illustrated; A Fair Barbarian, No. 2; Protestantism in Italy; Eric Scott's Destroyer and Her New Line, illustrated; Charles and Mary Lamb, with portraits; Striped Bass, illustrated; Peter the Great as Ruler and Reformer, illustrated; Glimpses of Parisian Art, illustrated; John Singleton Copley, R. A., by his granddaughter, illustrated; Musical Possibilities; Argonaut Society. Madame Delphine, a brilliant novelette, by George Cable, will begin in the May number.

The Homiletic Quarterly, January, 1881, has been received. The contents are divided into the following Sections: The Homiletical Section with Critical Index, the Modern Pulpit, Practical Homilies, and Children's Sermons; The Theological Section which includes Pastoral Symposium and the Expository Section; The Miscellaneous Section, which embraces the Preacher's Library, and Reviews. This number contains 111 double column octavo pages, and is a volume in itself of the most valuable homiletic literature. It is about the ablest publication of the kind with which we are acquainted. Rev. J. S. Exell is the English editor, and Rev. A. C. Caldwell, M. A., the American editor. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., New York, are the American publishers. Price $5 per annum.

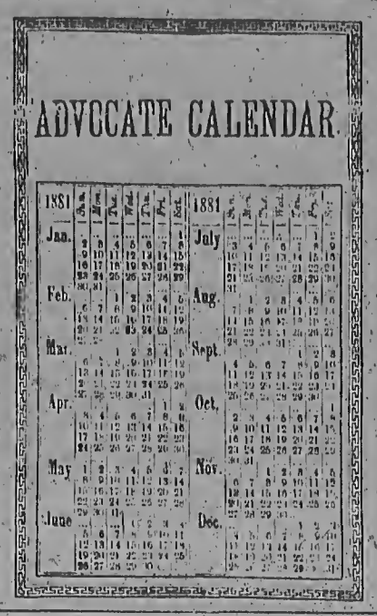
The Christian Citizen is the title of another sermon by Dr. Haygood, and issued by our Nashville Publishing House. The author discusses the Bible doctrine of government, and the duties and responsibilities of Christian citizens. These topics are handled forcibly and convincingly. We wish the sermon may have a wide circulation. It will do good. The Thanksgiving sermon will be sent by Dr. Haygood, Oxford, Georgia, without charge to any name. The Christian Citizen can be ordered from the Southern Methodist Publishing House Nashville, Tenn., [illegible] a copy or $1 per dozen.



"Martha Washington Messenger" is the title of a handsome monthly, edited and published by the young ladies of Martha Washington College, Abingdon, Va. Tom Swift was once dining with a family in which the matron boasted of the number of centuries to which the marital pedigree "de" had been the rightful property of her successors. The guest heard the tribute and set gold rule to the end, and then, collared the opinion of all that sort of aristocracy by saying: "Madam, will you kindly help me to another piece of that D. dumpling?"

A Bridgeport attorney recently took strong exception to a ruling of the court during a celebration. He said impossible. "I know, your honor," said he warmly, "that it is proper evidence. Here I have been married for all the last forty years, and now I want to know if I am a man or a liar, quietly pegged the court in a question of fact and evidence, and so I shall not pass from it, but let the jury decide."

The last sitter at a private dinner in England, who had got to the table so much beat at what time to retire, he thought he had better go to the door and bang one off to see something like a guide to the position of the moon, properly round, saying: "Why, I think I've been and gone and forgot my hat. I don't know where I am, I'm going to see what time it is." Then he went out and banged the door. England, all over.

When Lord John Russell went to stump Lancashire against the Ten Pounds Bill, some of the people were disappointed at finding him so small a man. People, however, explained that he was a big man to get the bill well through and but a pigmy to carry out the Administration. Disappointment speedily merged the crowd who had come to hear Lord Russell.

A Tennessee man accidentally shot a dog, and intending to explain to the owner how it occurred, accidentally shot him. A stranger thought he might help explain how the shot the man, but could not get a jury that was willing to listen to the explanation, they being of him.

Mrs. Fogarty has been experimenting again. This time it was at dressing-leaves. She heard everybody talking about it, so she tried it. She says she is sweet and pleasant, but didn't get more than half a thimbleful of juice, "and that didn't taste like nothin' neither."

A blushing young man escorted an equally bashful young lady. As they approached the dwelling of the damsel, she said entreatingly "Zeke, don't tell anybody you saw me home, Sary," said he emphatically, "don't you mind—I am as much ashamed of it as you be."

A bachelor, upon reading that "two lovers will sit up all night with one chair in the room," said it could not be done unless one of them sat on the floor. Such ignorance is painful.

BY REV. W. C. BLACK.

Parker, editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, says: "The history, success, policy and doctrines of Methodism are clearly and forcibly stated by the author, and the causes which lead to the wonderful success of Methodism are manifested with much acumen and intellectual power. We desire it will be extensively circulated. The Messenger of Methodism says: 'The work shows the author to be a devoted friend of the Methodist organization and polity. Pastors will derive great help from it in training their people. One cannot but be interested in the hundred pages for examination and information. FIVE FAMOUS OPERAS.

MIGNON. By AMBROISE THOMAS. This very successful opera, first becoming known in Paris, where it should long surely work its way to the immortality of the world, and has long enjoyed the similitude. It very well covers 125 pages, and furnishes to the purchaser quite a library of music of a high order.

AIDA. Grand opera by VERDI. Composed to be first time given for the ruler of Egypt, and first given in that ancient city, Memphis, where also is the scene of the story told. The splendor, the old Egyptian customs, costumes, etc., are made vivid by the thrilling music of one of the most brilliant of composers.

CARMEN. By GEORGES BIZET. A Spanish opera. Subject, Spanish love, bull fighting, gypsies, Spanish dress, Spanish customs, Spanish life, Spanish color and style. Andante Vivace in contrast with Toreador's song. Airs and incidents of the Spanish Peninsula make the music quite in consonance with the surrounding brilliancy.

MEFISTOFELE. By A. BOITO. Mefistofele is the true head according to Goethe, whose poem is the favorite. A daring, original, stirring, romantic and weird theme, now widely given, and pronounced a success.

FATINITZA. By E. VON SUPPE, whose music is first to last, and who is the writer of the celebrated boy and drummer song to Russians and Turks during the war. Very popular.

WORK FOR THE MONTH.

This month is the basis of our crops for the production of what we will call vegetable fruits. In all warm, light soils, such productions succeed admirably, and there is no country where the melon, in all its varieties, is grown in such beauty and perfection as in the Southern States.

Beans.—The Lima and the Sewee, especially the former, is the cream of all the shelled-bean family; they require good soil, and planted in hills; if the ground is still cold, defer planting until later, as they are liable to rot.

First put in strong poles four feet each way; place a handful of rich compost at its base, and with the hoe or plow, draw or furrow some soil over it; plant five good sound beans, eye downwards, around the pole, and cover with an inch of earth. When they have grown about a foot, tie the vines to the poles, and they will then provide for themselves, and produce beautiful crops from June till November; another planting can be made in May.

Wax, Pole and Dwarf Beans, plant by all means; they are luscious varieties, but are used as a snap, and not as a shelled-bean like the lima. Their pods are of a beautiful golden color and entirely stringless.

Beets.—Make another sowing of either Simons's red turnip, or blood turnip beet.

Corn.—Plant, for first, a little of Adams; next, early sugar, followed by Stowell's evergreen corn. A planting of either of the two latter should be made every two or three weeks till August or September, thereby securing one of the finest table vegetables for six months of the year.

Cucumbers.—Sow in hills the white spine and long green. If you wish only one sort, select the former, and make a small planting every month till August.

Cress and Mustard.—A small sowing for salads along with curled lettuce.

Nasturtium, where desired for pickles, should be sown; they fruit best when tied to trellises or poles.

Okra, or Gombo.—Sow in rows three feet apart, and thin out to four inches apart. Dwarf is the prominent and best variety.

Pumpkins of every desired variety should be planted in hills like corn. The many new and wonderful sorts with the most extravagant descriptions, are all excelled by the old cashaw.

Radish. Sow white summer and yellow summer, as the rich varieties would now become spongy. They will come off in six weeks; thin this crop, when up, to two inches apart. Radishes should, however, always be sown between other crops, as they soon come off the ground.

Squash.—There are four kinds in use, all of which have their peculiar qualities. Bush squash does not run, comes soon to maturity, and to have fresh must be frequently sown. Summer green and yellow continues to run and grow, producing throughout the season. The London marrow white squash has also the quality of growing and producing for months.

Tomatoes.—Independent of sowing in hot-beds for a later crop, sow in a warm bed or corner of the garden, covered at night or from cold winds until the season is favorable; as soon as they are four inches high, plant out into hills three feet apart, and two plants on a hill; as they grow, tie a few to stakes, and as soon as three feet high, pinch off the points of the vines, which causes them to mature their fruit earlier. Do not overlook planting the acme; it is the finest variety ever introduced, being early, solid and beautiful. Other desirable varieties are trophy, conqueror, hathaway, and Canada victor.

Herbs.—Now is the time for sowing a full assortment of these. If the weather is favorable, and the soil warm, all early hot-bed plants, such as tomatoes, egg plant, and peppers, can be transplanted to the open ground, and also transplant cabbage and lettuce from your winter-beds, if not already done.

Continue planting peas, extra early and premier extra early, advancer, champion, alpha, and premium gem, and a further supply of dwarf wax and valentine beans. Sow dutch butter, royal, cabbage, and perpignan lettuce, as they withstand the heat, and are not so liable to shoot to seed as the early varieties; sow also spinach, carrot, melon, onions, and leek, and, in fact, any other vegetables that you require, as the season is sufficiently advanced for any variety to do well. Give all the growing crops your attention. Just remember that good cultivation is almost as powerful a stimulant to the growth of plants as manure. Look out for weeds; they are enemies in your camp, and will rob your ground of a good portion of the nourishment that is intended for your crops.

HOW TO DESTROY THE BORER.

Elaines W. Robinson, Esq., of Fremont, Ill., an ex-president of the Illinois State Horticultural Society, gives the following mode of dealing with this destructive insect:

"The eggs are deposited in the bark of the tree, the beetle puncturing or splitting the bark of the tree upward or downward, and a little sidewise, the puncture looking very much as if made with an ordinary pocket-knife. The eggs are usually injected into this puncture so deep as to be out of sight; but not always. On young and thin-barked trees the eggs will be pushed in next to the wood; but in older and thicker-barked trees they will only be through the hard outer bark and inner soft bark. As soon as the eggs begin to hatch, which is in a few days after being deposited, its enlargement causes the puncture to open, and thereby it is much easier detected. The young borer hatches out in the inner side of the egg, and eats out a circular place the size of a half-dime; and then starts off, boring upward at first, but sometimes sidewise or downward. At this stage of development it is easy to detect the young depredator by a few drops of discolored juice of the tree exuding from the puncture and sticking on the bark. The larvæ usually bore down below the ground surface in the winter, and up again in summer, living in the larvæ state in the tree nearly two years; then boring out in the form of the beetle, ready to repeat their round again. The remedy I have successfully used, is to keep the ground around the trunk of the trees clean and mellow, so that there will be no cracks or openings there for beetles to get in to lay their eggs in the tree, and so that the puncture where the eggs are laid, or young beetles hatching may be easily seen, and eggs or insects destroyed, which can be done while in the egg, by merely pressing firmly on the puncture with a knife-blade (the cracking of the eggs can be heard distinctly), and, if hatched, by cutting away the dead bark over the cavity first eaten out and killing the young worm. The borers do not go into the wood much the first year, and can be easily followed by a knife; but, if not taken out soon after hatching, they seriously injure, if not entirely kill the tree, especially when they run around just under the bark, as they sometimes do. Dr. when several borers are in a small tree, they so injure it that it breaks over with the wind. If the ground is well cleared and patted down smooth around the tree about the last of June, the destroying of the eggs and young borers will be more certain. The trees should be examined twice or perhaps three times a year, if the borers are very numerous, in order that the first hatched may be killed before they do serious injury to the trees. August, September, and October are the months in which to destroy them. They seem to infest certain parts of the orchard from year to year, while others are comparatively exempt. Low grounds have been more infested with me than higher parts of the orchard. A man can usually examine and kill all eggs and borers in five hundred or more trees per day, if the ground has been properly prepared, and no work in any orchard has been so absolutely necessary."—Ohio Farmer.

WINTER CARE OF BEES.—Professor A. J. Cook, of the Michigan Agricultural College, says: "Beekeepers in the Northern States, have quite generally discarded houses built above ground for the purpose of wintering bees. It is found that to winter successfully, especially in-doors, the temperature must be kept nearly uniform at about 40° F. In a house above ground this is found to be difficult. If the walls are not very thick, the house becomes too cold at times, unless a great number of colonies are kept in it, in which case there is great danger of the house becoming too warm, especially in times of high temperature. Hence nearly all our most successful beekeepers now practice cellar wintering, in which, through the influence of the earth, especially if sub-earth ventilators are constructed, the temperature is quite easily controlled. Others prefer out-door wintering, in which the bees are kept either in a so-called chaff hive, which has double walls from four to eight inches apart, with the intervening space filled with chaff, or else the ordinary hives are surrounded by boards or a box, and the space between, which should be a foot wide, is filled with chaff or straw. In both cases the arrangements are such that the bees can fly whenever the weather is warm enough to induce flight."

THE RHODE-ISLAND TURKEY.—If we except the Bronze turkey, the Narragansett, or Rhode Island, stands at the head of all varieties now domesticated in this country. This popular bird originated on the shores of the bay of that name, and is raised in the greatest perfection in Rhode Island and Southern Connecticut, localities noted in past years, as well as at present, for their fine poultry.

It is worthy of notice, that in no other section of this country does turkey raising receive so much attention as in those favored localities.

These fowls are bred for market, without much regard to nice points of plumage, as the chief object looked after is size. This fowl is worthy of the attention of farmers and others contemplating keeping turkeys. They are hardy, easily kept, and attain great size and weight. No variety of turkeys in the hand of breeders has been so carefully selected in the breeding stock, nor continued so long, year after year, with the best results. The gobblers, when full-grown, will average twenty-five pounds, and the hens about fifteen.

PRACTICE ON THE FARM.—The Royal Agricultural Society very rightly, when adopting its motto "Practice with Science," placed practice first. It is in close attention to details that the elements of success in farming are to be sought. Economy in general management cannot be attained and habitually practiced unless a man understands, "even to the nail's breadth," the particular departments of his business. This particular knowledge can only be acquired on a farm, step by step, and day by day, as the working of the farm goes on. The ornamental farmer, like the ornamental manager or director in commercial affairs, is a complete failure.—London Agricultural Gazette.

PRESERVING GREEN TOMATOES.—A correspondent of the American Farmer says: "I preserve green tomatoes in this manner: Before the approach of frost I spread about six inches of straw in my hotbeds and in all the cold frames that I can spare; and when I think the tomatoes are no longer safe in the open ground, I pick them from the vines and place them on the straw in my frames, being careful not to heap them much. I then put on the sash and treat them pretty much as I would tender plants in my hotbed, giving them air whenever the weather will permit. Tomatoes can be preserved in this way until the first of January."

CHARCOAL FOR PEAS.—An English gardener writes to the Gardener's Chronicle, that last season he applied a good dressing of charcoal to some of his peas at the time of sowing, and that these grew very strong and resisted mildew entirely, while those sown in the usual manner were a total failure or nearly so, the mildew attacking them as soon as they were in flower. The charcoal used was the refuse of chemical works and was very finely powdered.

POTATOES.—A Kentucky farmer who knows how to raise four hundred bushels of potatoes per acre, gives these points as his method: Rich, light soil; plow deep early in the spring, plant fifteen inches apart, cover four inches deep or more; keep down the weeds, but do not work the ground after the potatoes bloom. The main secret, he says, is in selecting the seed. He always cuts off the blossom end. One eye will yield more potatoes than two.

Reports from the Vineland, N. J., vineyards are to the effect that the grapes seem to have stopped rotting, and there is prospect of an immense crop, since but slight damage was done by the last attack of the disease, and there is believed to be but little danger of its recurrence.

A Wisconsin farmer twenty-three years ago, planted a piece of waste land, unfit for cultivation, with black walnut trees. The trees are now from sixteen to twenty inches through and have been sold for $27,000.

A USEFUL BUG.—The bug known as the Buffalo tree hopper or pumpkin vine bug, eats the eggs of other bugs and hunts them off of orchard and forest trees.

It is said that a tea made of chestnut leaves, and drank in the place of water, will cure the most obstinate case of dropsy in a few days.

Household.

MUSTARD.—The seeds of two species of mustard (sinapis) are commonly used for culinary and medical purpose—black and white mustard seeds. A cotemporary says, what is not by any means universally true, that the flour of mustard, so extensively used as a condiment, is prepared from a mixture of the two kinds, usually in the proportion of two parts black and three parts white. The seeds are pounded and the husks then removed from the flour by sifting. It is remarkable that the pungent principle for which mustard is valued does not exist in the seeds, but is produced when the constituents of the seeds are brought together under the influence of water. Internally, flour of mustard is used as a stimulant, diuretic and emetic; externally as an irritant and rubefacient. White mustard seeds are often taken in an entire state as stimulants in dyspepsia. Mustard should be mixed with water that has been boiled and allowed to cool. Hot water destroys its essential qualities, and raw cold water might cause it to ferment. Put the mustard in a cup with a small pinch of salt, and mix with it very gradually sufficient water to make it drop from the spoon without becoming watery. The Germans have a way of preparing mustard in which much of its pungency is modified by spices. The following is an approved method of preparing it: Take of the white and black mustard seed, ground fine, each one pound, and half a pound of sugar. Pour upon this mixture a sufficient quantity of boiling vinegar to make it of the consistency of soft dough. It should then be stirred constantly with a paddle for about half an hour, in which time the mustard will swell and become much thicker. After it has cooked—say about an hour—add one ounce of powdered cinnamon and half an ounce of powdered cloves, and mix thoroughly. It may then be set away in tightly covered bottles and jars, and if the vinegar is good it will keep any length of time, and improve with age. It may be thinned with vinegar as it is wanted for use. Mustard prepared in this way is far superior to that mixed in the usual manner.

WOMEN WHO CAN COOK.—An English cotemporary avers that all Austrian ladies are accomplished cooks. This probably explains why complaints of dyspepsia and stories of immorality so seldom come from Austrian soirees. Food properly prepared never disarranges the human digestion or inflames the blood, but such food cannot be had with certainty if the table depends entirely upon the skill and temper of a hired cook. Ladies who manage their own kitchens, or are competent to do so, may be sure that their families will have food that is properly cooked and appropriate to the season. There is something inexplicable about American ignorance of the art of cooking. In Europe even gentlemen take pride in being able to prepare certain dishes, and ladies are glad to be known as practical managers of their respective households. Here, however, strong adults and feeble infants are alike dependent upon the ignorance of the kitchen. Were some of the industry displayed by American ladies in copying foreign customs devoted to kitchen management, on the Austrian plan, we would be a happier and better nation.—New York Herald.

HEALTHINESS OF MILK.—If any one wishes to grow fleshy, a pint of milk taken on retiring at night will soon cover the scrawniest of bones. Although we see a good many fleshy persons nowadays, there are a great many lean and lank ones, who sigh for the fashionable measure of plumpness, and who would be vastly improved in health and appearance could their figures be rounded with good solid flesh. Nothing is more coveted by a thin woman than a full figure, and nothing will so rise the ire and provoke the scandal of the "clipper-build" as the consciousness of plumpness in a rival. In case of fever and summer complaint, milk is now given with excellent results. The idea that milk is feverish has exploded, and it is now the physician's great reliance in bringing through typhoid patients, or those in too low a state to be nourished by solid food. It is a mistake to scrimp the milk pitcher. Take more milk and buy less meat. Look to your milk man; have large sized, well-filled milk pitchers on the table each meal, and you will have sound flesh and save doctors' bills.—Housekeeper.

HOW I MAKE LIGHT BREAD.—I will give my way for making light bread. Peel six large potatoes, and boil in one gallon of water. When done, pour the water off, mash the potatoes finely, and put in the water in which they were boiled in. When cool, put in your yeast and set it in a warm place to rise over night. In the morning put in flour enough to make a stiff batter, and let rise again. Then put in flour enough to make a stiff dough and mold and set to rise one hour. When light mold in loaves, and you can have your bread baked by nine o'clock in the summer. I know this to be a good way for making bread, for I have practiced it for a number of years.

CHICKEN PANADA. Skin the chicken and cut it up in joints. Take all the meat off the bones, and cut up into small pieces; put it in a jar with a little salt, tie it down, and set it in a saucepan of boiling water. It should boil from four to six hours; then pass it through a sieve with a little of the broth. It could be made in a hurry in two hours, but it is better when longer time is allowed. Do not put the wings in the panada.

KEEPING HAMS. Some one wanted to know, through the rural column, how to keep hams nicely. I will give this recipe, which we have followed for years, and we have never been troubled with the fly, and always have had good hams: After you have salted your hams in the usual manner, and just before smoking them, apply molasses with a brush, and sprinkle them over thickly with black pepper, adding one-fourth cayenne pepper.

SNOW PUDDING.—Half box of Cooper's gelatine, dissolved in a large half-pint of boiling water; when cool, stir in two teacups of sugar and the juice of two lemons, beat the whites of four eggs to a stiff froth and add them to the gelatine, beat all together thoroughly, pour in a mold and set on ice. Make a custard of the yolks of the eggs, one quart of milk and sugar to taste; boil in a farina kettle.

CRANBERRY SAUCE.—Dissolve three-quarters of a pound of sugar in one-half a pint of water, and let come to a boil and skim; have ready a quart of cranberries washed and well picked, and put them into the boiling syrup. Let all boil constantly, but not too hard, for twenty minutes. Pour into wet molds. By following minutely these directions, the sauce will turn out when cold like well-made jelly.

THE IOWA AEROLITE.—The Davenport, Iowa, Democrat of August 5, says: "In May, 1879, the largest meteoric stone ever beheld in America, fell on a farm in Emmet county. The farm belonged to Mrs. Colonel C. H. Perry, of Keokuk. The stone lay embedded fifteen feet deep in the ground for ten or twelve days, visited by hundreds of people, each one carrying off a piece of it. A friend of Mrs. Perry, residing in this city, wrote to her asking her if she would not like to have the meteorite stored in the Davenport Academy of Sciences. She replied that it would cost $150 or $160 to get it out and place it upon the railroad train—for something would have to be paid the tenant of the farm, who claimed a sort of partnership in the ownership—and if the academy would raise the amount it might have the stone and welcome. Alas! there wasn't a dollar in the academy treasury, and the effort to raise the amount failed. Then a Mr. Berge gave Mrs. Perry $160 for the stone, she supposing that he intended it for an institution in this State, and Mr. Berge gave the farm tenant $50 or $60 for the right of way across the fields. And so Mr. Berge got possession of that stone, and not long since he sold it to the British Museum for $6,500; and there it is to be placed in a glass case and preserved as a celestial wonder. Its weight when shipped for London was four hundred and thirty-one pounds."

—The Eucalyptus trees of Australia form a family of extremely viduable plants. Besides furnishing excellent hard timber, they yield products in oils, tirs, acids, dyes, tan and potash, which make them profitable for these purposes alone. The inner bark of most species makes an excellent packing paper, and the leaves yield one per cent. of a volatile oil. A tree of the species called the iron bark tree, or white gum tree, on being burned for charcoal, yielded twenty-eight per cent. of superior charcoal, forty-five per cent. of crude pyroligneous acid, and six per cent. of tar. Some of the species grow to a great size, the Eucalyptus gonicalyx, growing to be three hundred feet high, with a stem diameter of not rarely six, and sometimes even ten feet. Another species is lined as to its territory to a single mountain peak, four thousand feet above the sea, grows very slowly and has a dwarf, bushy habit, with little tendency to form a distinct stem. The genus is surpassed in the number of its species only by the Acacias.

—The Scientific American gives the following brief description of photo-engraving—an art which has reached a very high degree of perfection in this country: "In general terms, the producing engravings or types for printing by photography consists, first, in making a sharp negative of the picture to be engraved; second, in the photographic printing of a sheet of sensitized gelatine by means of the negative; third, in the development of the printed lines upon the surface of the gelatine by water; and fourth, in the casting of a copy of the developed gelatine sheet in metal, the mould so produced being used for printing on the press in the ordinary manner. All this is very simple, and in the hands of experienced and skilled persons very beautiful examples of printing-plates, having all the fineness and artistic effect of superior hand-engraved work, may be produced.

ANIMAL RUBBER.—An insect, which produces a species of India rubber, has been recently discovered in the district of Yucatan, Central America, by an American explorer. It is called peen, and belongs to the Coccus family; feeds on the mango, and swarms in these regions. It is of considerable size, yellowish brown in color, and emits a peculiar oily odor. The body of the insect contains a large proportion of grease, which is highly prized by the natives for applying to the skin on account of its medicinal properties. When exposed to great heat the lighter oils of the grease volatilize, leaving a tough wax, which resembles shellac, and may be used for making varnish or lacquer.—Growing World.

—Copernicus is said to have regretted that he had to die without having seen Mercury, and the planet is supposed to be very hard to detect. Watchfulness and a keen eye have much, however, to do with the matter. Mr. T. O. Simonton, of St. Paul, Minn., suggests in Nature that the planet's visibility depends more on the clearness of the sky than on the variations in its brightness. To his eye it is fully equal to a star of the first magnitude, was for a week last spring as bright as alpha Arietis, was brighter than Saturn for several evenings, and the day after its conjunction with Jupiter was found before the major planet. In 1876 he saw it for twenty-two days, and in 1881 for twenty days.

—Among all its wealth of minerals, the United States cannot reckon tin. Wales furnishes most of what is used in our country. At a recent meeting of the mineralogical section of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, Mr. Henry Carrill Lewis, a young scientist, but already of considerable celebrity, exhibited a small piece of tin ore, said to have been found in Surry county, N. C. The fact that it was a genuine native product was, however, received by the body with some hesitation.

—The opposition that iron in minute particles float in the atmosphere, and in time fall to the earth, has been confirmed by observations of snow collected on mountain tops, and within the Artic circle, far beyond the influence of factories and smoke. Some men of science believe that floating particles of iron bear some relation to the phenomena of the aurora.

—The King of Belgium offers a prize of 25,000 francs for the best monograph on the means of improving harbors on low and sandy coasts. Manuscripts sent by American engineers were to be sent through our Department of State, to the King of Belgium, before January 1st, 1881.

—Before the annual meeting of the Scientists at Saratoga, Professor Langley delivered an address on solar physics, and satisfied his large and critical audience that his discovery of oxygen in the sun, which has been heretofore strongly doubted, is clearly demonstrated.

—Dr. J. H. Shorthouse, states in the Lancet, that fog in rooms can be dispersed or lessened by allowing the steam from a kettle of boiling water to be diffused through the apartments. In thoroughfares he believes that a small locomotive giving off steam vapor would help to reduce and soften the fog.

—Herr Wohler has constructed a galvanic battery with aluminum as the only metal, which is strong enough to deflect the magnetic needle, decompose water, and raise a thin platinum wire to a glow. He uses with the metal dilute muriatic acid, or soda lye and concentrated nitric acid.

ow and Where Our Bibles are Made.

We take the reader this time to the tely brick building which occupies e entire triangular block in New ork bounded by Third and Fourth enues, and Eighth and Ninth streets, here the visitor will be sure to be ated with courtesy and his inquiries swered by intelligent and obliging cials.

The guide takes us first to see the ty horse-power engine, as to the siding yet imprisoned genius of the ce. Down in its dungeon, gloomy dark, it is doing a work superman, and is the motor of the whole gh building, while four hundred man workers are directing it and ng the work supermachinal.

There are two elevators to convey up down materials, bundles, books, chines, but none for the people, her employes or visitors; and by the we reach the top, we are well are the Bible House is six stories gh!

publishing house, printing the e book all the time, differs from se that issue new works; nearly all work is done from electrotype es. In typesetting only three or hands are required—for the Bible ord, published once a month, parts he gospels as they come out in new guages, documents, reports, circu- and when new electrotype plates needed—more hands being hired n they have extra work. Thus n we came to the pressroom we had ten compositors, and those ing up the four Gospels and the in Bengal a language of the west st of Africa, partly a reprint and ly a new translation. The general ence is to import the foreign ver- s, for which there is but a small here, and to publish them where language is spoken. While our lish has twenty-seven characters, Arabic has some four hundred; we really see the foreign work is best n its own ground.

e have set out to describe, not making or sale, but Bible-making. here we arrive at the very start- point of the paper warerooms, here piles upon piles of blank paper in rcades, destined in very short to come out the finished Bible. supply of paper is kept on hand as needed as is necessary, several hs in advance or more, governed the market.

We come to the printing-press s are seven Adams presses, three lumber presses of R. Hoe & Co., Hoe job presses for small work, wheels are going furiously, and ladders lest he be caught, drawn crushed. There come the blank s of white paper. They are fed the revolving cylinders or the flat , and before we can see them- s, quick as lightning, the sheet rinted. Of the same Bible they e any quantity, of the cheap five ment about four copies, Finer work of course requires ger time. The paper, having caught impression from the well-inked es taken off and hung by the over drying frames, and there ays works to dry. The peculiarity heir book-making operations, the sult of haste in the process, sec is pressed of drying machines to more rapidly.

These are put under the high hydraulic es, where we see some forty reams per under six hundred tons press.

Now the backs are put under the to prepare for sewing, with raised ink band, which is the mode they the strong twine over which the stitches the leaves firmly to- ; breaking off at each volume, commencing the next until the , or six books, is finished. The room where the sewing is done is ly place, with the swift-flying s of thirty women, and whence ese bunches of books from their s ready for binding. In one sense cheapest book with the cheapest ing is the most valuable, in that it s more readers. The multitude of buy Turkey morocco or gilt, they can buy the immense, neat, clumsy book, the twenty-five cent Bible, of which the society prints an hour, or the five-cent Testa- of which for two years there have made a thousand a day.

The prepared cloth, suit- for its purpose, lies in rolls, are cut into the shapes and sizes red for the outer dress of the . The sheep covers are completed er. cost of Bibles ranges from twenty- nts to twenty-seven dollars, and e there are various details of facture which we have not de- ibed. There are a backing machine, work is to make the back fit on hinge; the more elaborate sew- make the book pliable, and the go the edges. For gilding, the is placed between boards, the ed is laid on the pasted edges, hen dry is burnished with blood- and agate. Of those, the past they have issued three hundred ty-six, and during thirty-seven eleven thousand five hundred. nty-two.

rule of the house is to sell Bibles The more they manufacture, eaper they can sell them. The n said he would that they print- ions of a hundred thousand; now they issue editions of four thousand to fifty thousand. In the sales-room there are specimens of every variety. They tell us the demand constantly increases. And, as we come through the packing-room, they are filling an order for twenty-three boxes.

Last of all are we shown into the manager's room, which is adorned with portraits of the six presidents, Elias Boudinot, President of Congress and Director of the United States Mint, who gave the society ten thousand dollars, John Jay the famous patriot, Richard Varick, Theodore Frelinghuysen, Luther Bradish and William H. Allen.

The present century is distinguished for putting in circulation, through our own and the British Society, versions of the Scripture in two hundred and thirty languages or dialects. Four-fifths of this is the direct fruit of modern scholarship and missionary enterprise, and one-fourth of it includes the whole Bible. The Testament is in part translated into Japanese; the Bible has been revised in five different colloquials of China; there is a new edition of the Testament in the language of the Gilbert Islands, and of Genesis in that of the Marshall Islands. A translation has been made into the Zulu, into the Mpongne, the most important language of equatorial Africa, into the Muskokee and Dakota, the latter spoken by fifty thousand Indians. Drs. Williamson and Riggs gave forty years to this Dakota version. The Arabic Bible cost Drs. Eli Smith and Van Dyck the labor of sixteen years. Dr. Schauffler was fourteen years preparing Osmanleo version, and Dr. Schereshewsky devoted fifteen years to translating the Bible into the Mandarin colloquial. The past year is marked by completing the Bible in the Turkish language.

At our Centennial the Society had a very handsome stand, and at the Paris Exposition the gate of the Trocadero was distinguished by a depository, where the gospels, psalms, Bibles and Testaments were sold or given away. We saw an old French soldier in the Jardin des Plantes dividing his time between the Parisian Journal and a Gospel of John, the latter a gift from the Exposition. From the way he handled it, we judged it to be a rare sight to him.

As a matter of supply and demand, the business of printing Bibles can no more cease than seed time and harvest, for the world can no better exist without the one than the other. Pushing, and Christian Intelligencer.

A Chinese Funeral.

A little over a week ago, in the settlement of Nanta, an old Chinese lady died in the age of ninety-eight years. We were invited to witness the ceremonies attached to the funeral of the deceased, and although numerous are the customs regarding funerals in China, this funeral more than any one I have had occasion to see, possesses peculiarities, for the ostentation of money expended thereon, which, as will be seen further on, comes to piles of round figures, and the body has not yet been interred.

The house of the deceased, as far as we could see, could not be styled by a very few words. She was the daughter of a high official very powerful in Hainan province and the wife of a very opulent tea merchant who died some eight years ago, at the ripe age of ninety-five. She married very early, and leaves sons and daughters, with their progeny, verging upon the seventies and eighties. The old lady died at a late hour in the evening and her body was laid out upon an improvised table, weeping and wailing continuing until an early hour of the morning, at which time we were called upon to witness the religious ceremonies which were to take place preparatory to the incarceration of the body in the coffin, which, as was one of ordinary proportions, had been made during the interval, right in front of the door of the house, and in the middle of the street. The first burst of grief having been vented, sack-cloth and white cloth were brought out and distributed, amongst the numerous mourners who were crowding around the body of their relative. The room was then cleared of all males, and the females who remained prepared the body for the lying in state which took place shortly afterwards. The clothes was decked out in clothes of gaudy silks and satins, red shoes, the woman was small-footed and a magnificent sou-si, gold head-dress set with pearls and king fisher's feathers, which was valued at $1,200. Her hands were swathed in cotton and enveloped in coverings of white silks tied with red silk cords; about her neck hung a long gold and amber bead necklace, containing ninety-eight gold and ninety-eight amber beads which were said to represent the number of years she had lived. Appended to this necklace was a silver Chinese padlock with two keys, which upon inquiry, we learned were for the purpose of securing an entrance to the abode of "Joss." The body was surrounded by innumerable lighted candles brought to the house by the various relatives of the deceased, each person bringing two, and remained lying in state in a corner of the house, which, by the way, did not speak very highly of the riches said to be possessed by her relatives. Joss sticks were in attendance and brought in charge wooden upright pots in which were several incisions, and each of the deceased's sons and daughters, inserting a piece of wood into one of the incisions, went round this pole seven times uttering lamentations in praise of the deceased, this funeral ceremony seeming of more importance for its

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

CHARLESTON, Feb. 22.—The grand jury of Darlington to-day found a true bill against Colonel Cash for the murder of Colonel Shannon in a duel. The case has been set for trial on Thursday next.

LITTLE ROCK, Feb. 22.—In the house of representatives to-day a joint resolution was passed, by a vote of 66 to 17, proposing an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the sale of liquors in the State.

In the senate a joint resolution was passed by a vote of 18 to 5, fixing the pronunciation of the name of this State as "Arkansaw."

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 22.—A dispatch from El Paso, Texas, says: News has been received here from Chihuahua, New Mexico, that Indians are again on the war path in that region, two hundred of them attacked a settlement near Carroles a few days ago, killed several women and children, and plundered the place.

Advices from Fort Cummings, N. M., says that Lieutenant Morny, with Company K, Ninth Cavalry, and thirty Indian scouts, has just returned from following a band of Apaches into Mexico. He came upon their camp in a canyon in the Candaleaia mountains, on the night of the 12th instant, but before he could attack them the Indians broke and scattered in the mountains and could not be overtaken.

The camp and thirty horses were captured. Lieutenant Morey pursued these Indians 150 miles over a rough, barren country, and for eight days could procure only alkali water and for two days was without water of any kind.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—Senator Matt. H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, died at his residence in this city this morning. Ex-Gov. Henry D. Cook, died at his residence in Georgetown this morning.

DARLINGTON, S. C., Feb. 26.—In the Cash-murder trial to-day, the jury twice returned into court with the announcement that they were unable to agree. The judge finally ordered a mistrial. It was understood that the jury stood 8 for conviction and 4 for acquittal. An acquittal was generally anticipated, and the result is regarded as a substantial triumph for the anti-lynching sentiment of the State.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27.—The passage of the River and Harbor bill is now regarded as assured. The appropriation for carrying out the plans of the Mississippi River Commission has been agreed to by both houses, and cannot be changed. The President will sign the bill.

According to the usual practice of the United States Engineer Corps, the officers begin at the mouth of the river, and it is also provided in the organic law constituting the Commission, that the work of improvement shall be begun at the mouth of the river and prosecuted upwards, so that this first appropriation will be applied in this way, the discretion of the Commission being free as to the methods of treatment.

SUMMIT, Miss., Feb. 28.—The wife of Gen. Lyttis Bussey, president of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, died here last night. Gen. Bussey leaves this evening with the remains for Keokuk, Iowa, where she will be buried.

MONTGOMERY, Feb. 28.—The long contested bill for the award of the over-lapping lands passed the legislature to-day in favor of the railroad. The amount involved is over $10,000.

The bill to increase the salary of the Supreme Court judges was also passed.

Captain Bragg was elected president of the railroad commission.

ENTERPRISE, Miss., Feb. 28.—John H. Cooke, Esq., living three miles south-west of Enterprise, had his residence accidentally burned on the night of the 24th inst., and but few of his things were saved. The total loss amounted to more than $2000, with no insurance.

About ten o'clock on the same day Purcell and Will Wilhelm, two young men who came here a few years ago from Ohio, and engaged in merchandise and farming four miles southeast of this place, had their storehouse and residence, both under same roof, destroyed by fire. Loss is $2000, with no insurance.

FOREIGN.

ROME, Feb. 22.—The pope, in his address to the cardinals on the 20th inst., in reply to their congratulations on the anniversary of his election to the pontifical throne, expressed regrets at the renewed attacks and insults heaped upon the church in nearly all parts of the world. Therefore, an extraordinary jubilee would be inaugurated this year throughout christendom, for the purpose of imploring the Almighty to bestow better times on the church.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—The Prince of Wales and Duke of Edinburg will start for Berlin to-night, to be present at the wedding, on Sunday, the 27th inst., of the eldest son of the Crown Prince, Frederick William, of Prussia, and Princess Augusta Victoria, of Holstein Augustenburg. Berlin is already crowded with wedding guests, including special envoys from various sovereigns and foreign States.

BERLIN, Feb. 25.—The religious ceremony of the marriage of Prince William and Princess Augusta, was performed this evening in the chapel of the Royal Castle by the Chief Court Chaplain. A grand court reception was afterwards held in Whitehall. This was followed by a State banquet, at which the Emperor toasted the bride and bridegroom.

NEWCASTLE, Natal, Feb. 26.—A severe engagement took place to-day between the Boers and the Colley's force, and the latter was driven from its position at Spitzkop. There was great loss on both sides. Many British officers were killed and wounded.

Later telegrams from Colley's camp say that all the wounded coming in agree in reporting that Gen. Colley has been killed, and that only one hundred British have escaped. The Boers charged up the hill four times, and were about to retreat, when the British ammunition forced to retire because the reserves had not been taken to the extreme summit.

LONDON, Feb. 28.—The Dublin correspondent of the Times says: Signs of disunion and weakness in the organization of the Land League are becoming more numerous, under the continuous action of the government. Many treasurers and secretaries of local branches of the league have resigned and are in favor of emigration. The payment of rent is becoming general, even in the most disturbed districts and there is little difficulty now in serving writs, owing to the exertion of the Orange committee. The removal of the league fund to a foreign country is regarded by the tenants with suspicion, and the alarm of leaders, who talked so bravely when they incurred no risk, has also helped to shake confidence in the league. There are unmistakable signs of the league being rapidly disintegrated and if the improvement continues at the present rate return to at least the semblance of tranquility will soon be general.

Church Work in New York City.

If any one should wish to ascertain what is being done in the largest city in this country by churches and benevolent societies, he will find all the materials he would need in a little book compiled by Mr. Lewis E. Jackson, of the New York City Mission. New York now contains a population of upward of twelve hundred thousand, which is probably of a more heterogenous character than can be found in any other city in the country. Almost every nationality and religion is represented, the foreign born numbering almost half a million, while many of those classed as native-born are of foreign parentage. The difficulties of city evangelization are very great. That there is an immense amount of such work to be done is evident at first glance. There are, it is estimated, about half a million people who do not go to any church. Many of these must be sought at their homes, to be reached at all. If they do not go to church to hear the gospel, the gospel must be proclaimed to them in their own homes. The churches, therefore, to do the work which ought to be done, must become missionary organizations, and work among neglected neighborhoods, as missionaries do in Africa. "Ministers (we quote from Mr. Jackson's book) have to be missionaries if they are ever to keep their places as ministers. The population shifts. People do not get seats; or even present letters, of course. They have, in too many instances, to be won, persuaded, instructed, and influenced for their good."

We have stated that about 500,000 of the city's population are classed as non-churchgoers. For the 700,000 who go to church, more or less regularly, there are 360 churches and 123 missions, provided with 375,000 sittings. These churches and missions have altogether somewhat less than 250,000 members. If, therefore, all the members should go to church on any one Sunday, there would be sittings for only 125,000 non-communicants. This is not a satisfactory showing; nor is it reassuring to read that, while the city is adding 20,000 a year to its population, there is no proportionate increase of churches. Fifty years ago there was one church to every 18,8 inhabitants; now the proportion is one to 2,468. "There are large districts," we are told, "in the city, equal in population to Springfield or Hartford, "without a single Evangelical church."

What is being done among the half a million non-churchgoers? There are 148 Protestant missions for their benefit and about 216 missionaries who work among the poor and sick. Besides these missionaries, there are hundreds of visitors, distributing tracts, affording relief, and doing good in various ways. In the 148 missions, 15 have communion charters, with self-government, the industry, and the ordinances; being, in fact, fully-equipped mission churches. The New York city Mission, which is undenominational, owns five chapels and reports three organized churches, with 1,000 members. During the year the agents of the Society entered 1,277 houses to attend churches and missions.

It appears that of the 360 churches in the city, the Protestant Episcopal Church has the largest number. We show the order of the various denominations, the number of churches and sittings, in a tabulated form, as follows:

Denomination.	Churches and Missions.	Sittings.
Protestant Episcopal	57	37,000
Presbyterian	39	30,000
Methodist Episcopal	36	25,000
Reformed Dutch	31	20,000
Baptist	31	20,000
Roman Catholic	29	30,000
Reformed (Dutch)	25	20,000

Reformed Presbyterian	8	6,000
Presbyterian Associate	8	6,000
Universalist	5	3,000
Friends	3	1,000
Scattering	17	12,000

These churches have property valued at about $20,100,000 and pay their ministers $904,100 yearly.—New York Independent.

Louisiana Conference Minutes.

In preparing the minutes for publication the secretary has made some very glaring mistakes. The number of local preachers at Lake Charles, are two, but the minutes report none; there are no colored members, yet they say there are two. The two was put in the wrong column. There was $52 25 collected for church repairs, but the amount is put at $178 10; this, I think, should be credited to Sugartown. Collected for other objects, should have been $10; instead of $8, as the minutes have it. The amount assessed for the presiding elder was $40, and of that amount, $33 20 was paid, whereas, the minutes tell us, he was assessed $8, and paid $10. Lake Charles is credited with $19 00 Foreign Mission as collected from the congregation, when in fact $37 80 was collected. All the assessments, except for the pastor and presiding elder, were more than met, and largely in excess of what they had been in former years. Hereafter, I think, the Conference should take time to have the reports of all the preachers read, item by item, and all mistakes corrected by the preachers themselves, before the session is adjourned. As the minutes need the practiced eye of a good proof reader, as they are being passed through the press, the Conference should not fail to provide for one, then mistakes will be fewer.

SHREVEPORT, LA., Feb. 10, 1881.

The Barn that Vanderbilt Built.

This is the stable Vanderbilt. Its interior is like a church, except that few churches in New York, says one account, are so elegant or costly. Probably no structure for the four-footed race, not even that of the worshipful white elephants of Siam, approaches it in these respects. The façade represents French architecture of the Renaissance. Great Gothic arches spring from the ground to the top of a tall first story; brick and granite and terra cotta are brought together most artistically. Above the second story is formed by a row of tall stone dormer windows. Bursting from the wall to the right of the carriage door is the head of a noble stallion. The neck of the beast is arched in a manner that conveys an idea of strong excitement, if not fury, in the brute. His eyes bulge from his head, his nostrils are dilated, the cords of his neck are swollen, his jaws are set. On the opposite side of the arch is the head, and neck of a mare—of a slender-nosed, small-featured, almost deer-like aufloral. The eyes of the two figures are on each other. They are cast in terra cotta, from designs by E. Kemeys, the famous sculptor. Mr. Kemeys has added the heads of three dogs in terra cotta for the medallions between the dormer windows. The central head is as big as half a flour barrel. It is the head of a Spherian blood-hound. The under jaw droops, the tongue lolls out, and the eyes leer. To the left is a mastiff's head, and on the other side the massive face of a bulldog. The mastiff is about to bark. Elsewhere, set in the brick-work, are panels containing, in terra cotta, ears of corn, wisps of wheat and other studies from nature. The doorway opens upon the coachroom—a great square chamber, walled with light-tinted enamelled brick, the edges of which, wherever a door or panel breaks them, are lined with pressed brick studded with big knobs of red clay. The floor is of cement and the ceiling is of fire-proof blocks, beneath which will be set a figured roof of carved hard wood. On either side of the further doorway leading to the stable are other specimens of Kemeys's work. One represents a tangle of clover, the other a tuft of grass. The stable looks like a Moorish temple. In the centre it is open from the floor to the vaulted light that serves for a roof. An ornamental gallery, built of terra cotta, springs from the walls. Beneath it the walls are of alternated black and yellow enamelled bricks. Columns of polished brass, surmounted by ornamental capitals, support the gallery and mark divisions of the stalls. All the fastenings of these stalls are to be of silver-plated. Twisted columns of cast spring from the balustrade of the gallery to the vaulted roof, and in a curtain of pressed brick, in square nameless panels designed by a botanist. They embrace wheat, barley, vegetables, currants, chestnuts, strawberries, oats, corn, rye, oyster-shells, etc. They are so delicately moulded that a close view brings out numerous features. The gallery or hay loft is a mass of these sketches.—Watchman.

THE NEW BIBLE (OLD) WORK.—The new version of the New Testament, which has been so many years in course of translation, and which is unquestionably the most important literary enterprise this century has seen, is being waited for with curiosity and anxiety by hundreds of thousands. It is not generally known that a first edition of 500,000 copies has already been manufactured in England, and 100,000 copies are said to be already in New York City, but one of them permitted to be sold. They are awaiting a telegram from the authorities in England authorizing their issue. The first copies can only be had at the extravagant price of ten dollars per copy. The Literary Revolution proposes fully to meet the demands which its army of friends are making upon it by doing probably the quickest work in book making which has ever yet been accomplished. Arrangements have been fully made to put the entire book into type inside of twenty-four hours, from the time a printed copy of the English edition can be procured, and within three days at least 10,000 copies will be bound ready for delivery to waiting purchasers, and at least 5,000 copies will be manufactured every day thereafter, until the demand is met. It will be printed in large, beautiful type, neatly and strongly bound in cloth, in a volume of about five hundred pages, and sold at the nominal price of thirty cents. A fine edition in half Russia, gilt top, will be sold for sixty cents, and one in full Turkey morocco, gilt edges, for one dollar and twenty-five cents. Of course, the popular demand will be enormous. Orders will be filled in the order in which they are received, with remittance.

Dr. Stephen H. Tyng's recent sermon on the "Evils of Immigration" is awakening attention to this important topic. He tells us that, in the thirty years ending 1877, 300,000 more Protestants than Catholics came to this country. From Germany there had come 1,310,000 Protestants and 780,000 Roman Catholics, and from Ireland 1,500,000 Roman Catholics and 475,000 Protestants, making 517,000 more Protestants than Roman Catholics. The total for the thirty years from all countries foots up 3,000,000 Protestants and 2,700,000 Roman Catholics.

BEN AND SPIDER.

BY R. W. GILDER.

I like a cloister and a grassy field
Where many flowers there once yield
Themselves to their pleasures through that rude shock
To me a pebble, like to this we see
Cleaving the sward, and fetched with slow impetuous sway
Perhaps it perished so, and perhaps it brought Alone into a white and glittering palace,
And the small spider blames the cloud of mire
Who wrought the wreck. Blessed his pretty art!
Who knows what day a scanty ray of light,
An idle wonder through the fields of space,
Large-limbed, big-brained, to whom our puny race
Seems spell-bit insects; one whose feeble jaws
On single vast continents islanded by stars
Who knows when idle, just leaning on the shore,
May fling a stone and crush our earthly globe,
And all that men have builded with their wits!
Ah, what a boast you say; our books to be,
Bound our temples, shrines and fire glow,
Of glorious conquests; and not the pages,
Our poets have climbed through our realages
What boots the longest lease? Another day
Will see the self-same hill, and the play
Of light on valley with the same
You say
The spider's work is not original,
But what of ours? Ah! friend, I think that all
We do is just the same thing over and over.
Take life: a man have the woman and her lover—
Think as Eliot, nothing new in that!
Take Building, and you reach ere long the flat
Like desert sands by way of Paine, Roger Greene
And Grace is poetry: our bards interpret
Humanity, but, before John Keats, the rose,
Of old, was sung by Shakespeare, Dante, Job.
No, no! The forms may change, but even they Could could again. Could we but scan it
Well nigh in the heavens some little, tiny planet
Where all we are, was borrowed, and of to-day
The imagined ghost there is just heroic stage;
And we and all our mighty schemes were done.
Be sure a secret penance and short-lived trouble
As ours for those small creatures in the puddle.

"Form of Excommunication."

MR. EDITOR: In looking over a copy of your paper, of January 27, I find published therein as "Form of Excommunication," said to have been translated from the French for the Christian Advocate, Galveston, from the Courier des Etats Unis of Paris, France. I always understood that this paper was published in New York, but let this pass. The Advocate says that the "text is the form of excommunication such as is actually registered in the Chancery of the Vatican. Now, Mr. Editor, so far from this being an original document, I will state that it was published by Rev. Laurance Sterne, in his clever novel of Tristram Shandy, in 1761. You will find it in the third volume of book, page 76. It is there stated to have been "pronounced out of the Ledger book of the Church of Rochester, written by Ernulphus, the Bishop." And it has no doubt been published and republished hundreds of times as an original document just discovered; and each publication with a preface intended to throw additional odium on the Church of Rome and her members. The last I heard of its publication it was said to have been fulminated against Victor Emanuel. I am therefore surprised that the New Orleans CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE should give credit so to it wide such an information without first making proper enquiry regarding its history. And I thus ask you, in justice to us Catholics, to publish this communication, so that your numerous readers may learn something of the history of this document.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. P. SCANLAN.

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 28, 1881.

The editor of the Texas Christian Advocate, in his introductory paragraph, says that the document referred to by Mr. Scanlan, was translated from the Courier des Etats Unis, of Paris, by a well known citizen of Galveston, but of French parentage and education. There is a mistake in regard to the place of publication of the "Courier des Etats Unis." We have no means at hand of verifying the statement that it was translated from that paper, nor that it is registered in the Chancery of the Vatican. However this may be, the form of excommunication, as published, is a genuine document of Catholic authorship, and faithfully copied by Sterne, the Latin original and the translation being published in parallel columns.

The Southwestern Presbyterian had occasion not long since to notice this matter, and for the information and satisfaction of our correspondent we give the substance of the article from that paper, as follows:

THE SCIENCE OF CURSING.

One good result of Romanists denying the outrages perpetrated by their church is that public attention is called to the facts of the case.

The Pontificale Romanum, provides for the use of Bishops, an official form of excommunication. But as cursing has always been a favorite amusement in this church, it could not be supposed that Bishops would limit themselves to this, especially as they all seemed to have the liberty to exercise their own taste and skill in this department. The literature of the Middle Ages is full of specimens each of which seems ambitious to surpass all the rest in malignity. The form with which everyone is familiar, is a good illustration. It is the curse of Ernulphus, as Sterne gives it in Tristram Shandy. This one seems to have been intended for ordinary culprits more than for distinguished personages. It enumerates its malignant imprecations with unction which shows how much the author delighted in it.

We have before us a number of other forms of the same character, intended not only for men, but for animals, rats, insects, etc., which we will cheerfully produce if our Romish co temporary will agree to publish them.

Sterne says he got this one from the chapter clerk of the Cathedral of Rochester which is quite probable. Bohn's edition of his works prints the translation. But if he did not obtain it there, he could easily have found it in Sir Henry Spelman's Glossarium Archaiologicum, under the word, Excommunicatio. It may also be found in an unquestionable Romish authority of the seventeenth century, Etienne Baluze, Professor of the Canon Law in the Royal College of France, (see his Miscellanea volume ii, page 469-70). There is no advantage growing out of the fact that Romish writers deny the genuineness of the curse of Ernulphus, as Sterne calls it. It affords an opportunity of showing its historical character, and also how little they know of the outrageous character of such performances, and how ready they are to deny them when they think the facts cannot be established.

The official curse of the Pontificale Romanum, is as follows:

Form of Greater Excommunication to be used by the Bishops,—from the Pontificale Romanum.

Because N, persuaded by the devil, putting off the Christian profession he molest Baptism by apostacy, is not afraid to waste the church of God, to plunder its goods, and violently to oppress the poor of Christ; anxious therefore lest he perish through pastoral neglect, for whom in the awful judgment before the chief Shepherd, our Lord Jesus Christ, we must give an account, as the Lord himself fearfully threatens, saying: "If thou declare not to the wicked man his wickedness, I will require his blood at thy hands." We have admonished him canonically once, twice, thrice, and even a fourth time, to convince him of his wickedness, inviting him to repentance, satisfaction, and penance, and laying to him for his father's affection. But despising, alas! our salutary admonitions, inflamed with the spirit of pride, he disdained to satisfy the Church of God which he injured. Being instructed by the precepts of our Lord and his apostles what to do with such perverse persons—for the Lord saith, "If thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee;" and the apostle says, "Put away evil from among you," and again, "If any one who is called brother is a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or malicious, or drunken, or greedy, with such, no, not to eat," and John, a disciple of Christ, believes beyond the others, forbids such a one even to be saluted, saying, "Receive him not into thine house, nor say to him, Hail!" for he that says to him, Hail! communicates with his wicked works." Therefore fulfilling the precepts of our Lord and his apostles, cut off the putrid and degraded member, that will not receive healing, by the sword of excommunication from the body of the church, lest the other members of the body be infected by the poison of a pestilential disease. Therefore, because he hath despised our admonitions and frequent exhortations, because called three times, according to the Divine command, he despises to amend or cease to persevere; because he neither thinks of his fault nor confesses it; but on a message being sent, pretends some excuse, nor asks forgiveness, but the devil hardening his heart, perseveres in the course of wickedness he has begun, according to what the apostle says, 'After thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest wrath against the day of wrath." Therefore, with all this accomplices and favorers, to the judgment of God Almighty, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and the blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and of all the saints, also in the exercise of our interior authority, and power of binding and loosing in heaven and in earth, Divinely entrusted to us by the blood of the Lord, we separate you from the fellowships of all Christians, from the fellowships of all Christians, from the fellowships of all Christians, and exclude you from the threshold and exclude you from the threshold and from the holy mother church in heaven and on earth, and decree you to be excommunicated, and adjudge you to be anathematised, and condemned with anathematised, and condemned with the devil and his angels, and all the reprobate in eternal fire, until he be recovered from the snares of the devil, and brought to amendment and penance, and satisfy the Church of God, which he has injured; delivering him to satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of judgment.

All respond, "So be it! So be it! So be it!"

On which the Bishops and all the priests present, cast the lighted candles to the ground, which they hold in their hands, and letters are sent to the neighboring parishes and bishops, containing the name and sentence of the excommunicated.

Was Mr. Wesley in Possession of the Blessing of Sanctification?

Your correspondent, K., of December 16, 1880, makes the startling announcement that he was not. This caused me to re-examine his writings, to see if there were grounds for such a conclusion. As he understood the doctrine of sanctification, I find that he was in full possession of it. The strange expressions in that article may do good, by causing many to examine the subject more carefully. For the benefit of those who have not his works, I will give a few extracts. Mr. Wesley's reasons for not publicly saying, in so many words, "I am sanctified," may be seen by consulting volume V., pages 109-10 which read as follows: "Is there an example in Scripture of a person who had attained to this?"

"Yes; St. John, and those of whom he says in his first Epistle, 'Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have confidence in the day of judgment, because as he is, so are we in this world.'"

But why are there no more examples of this kind recorded in the New Testament?

It does not become us to be peremptory in this matter. But one reason might possibly be, because the apostle wrote to the church while it was in its infancy; therefore they might mention such persons the more sparingly; lest they should give strong meat to babes. "Can you show me one such example now, where is he that is this perfect? To some who make this inquiry, we might answer, if I knew one I would not tell you; for you do not inquire out of love," You are like Herod, your only seek the young child to slay it. But more directly there are numberless reasons why there should be, if any, indisputable examples. What inconveniences would this bring upon the person himself, set a mark for all to shoot at. What a temptation to others, not only to men who know not God, but to believers themselves. How hardly would they refrain from idolizing such a person? and yet how unprofitable to gainsay us. For if they hear not Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

Did not some such reasons prevent Mr. Wesley from making a public profession of Christian perfection? Would not his persecutors say, Mr. Wesley professed to be as holy as angels; he is sinless, etc., etc. No doubt in love feast, he spoke of his attainments, but did not think proper to open a fresh cause for personal abuse.

Neither can I think Mr. Wesley said any thing against the doctrine, from the fact that he did not allow any of the preachers under his charge to do so. See his letter to Adam Clarke, November 26, 1790 only a few months before his death, volume VII, page 206.

"To retain the grace of God is infinitely more than to gain it. Hardly one in three does this, and this should be strongly and explicitly urged upon all who have tasted of perfection.

"If we can prove that any of our local preachers or leaders, either directly or indirectly speak against it, let him be preacher or leader no longer. I doubt whether he should continue in the society, because the that speaks thus in our congregations cannot be an honest man."

In volume VI, page 529, will be seen what he said about throwing away the child, "But this doctrine has been much abused, so has that of justification by faith; but this is no reason for giving up this, or any other scriptural doctrine. When you wash your child, as one speaks, throw away the water but not the child."

Volume V, page 232, "Strongly, explicitly exhort all believers to go on to perfection. That we may all speak the same thing, I ask once for all, shall we defend this perfection, or shall we give it up?" You all agree to defend it, mentioning thereby (as we did from the beginning) salvation from all sin, by the love of God and unmingled our heart." Volume IV, page 453, "Here I found the plain reason why the work of God had gained no ground on this circuit all the year. The preachers had given up the Methodist testimony. Either they did not speak of perfection at all, the peculiar doctrine committed to our trust, or they spoke of it in general terms, without urging believers to go on to perfection, and to expect it every moment, and wherever soever this is not earnestly done, the work of God does not prosper." Volume VII, page 203. To Mr. Adam, afterwards Dr. Adam, Clarke: "You do well in insisting upon full and present salvation, whether men will hear or forbear, but you need not wonder that all these are opposed, not only by formalists, but by half Methodists."

To Mr. Joseph Benson: "Is there no deliverance, no salvation, from this inbred enemy? Surely there is, else many great and precious promises must fall to the ground. 'I will sprinkle clean water upon you and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you. I will circumcise your heart, from all sin, to love the Lord with all thy heart and with all thy soul.' This I term sanctification; which is both an instantaneous and a gradual work, or perfection. Be being perfected in love, filled with love, which still admits of a thousand degrees." Volume VII, p. 199.

To Miss Cook, afterwards Mrs. Clarke: "Bristol, September 24, 1785. See that you hold fast the beginning of your confidence steadfast unto the end; and how soon may you become a partaker of sanctification, and not only by a slow and insensible growth in grace, but by the power of the highest overshadowing you, in a moment, in a twinkling of an eye, so as utterly to abolish sin, and to renew you in his whole image. I have done what I proposed, I have given a plain and simple account of the manner wherein I first received the doctrine of perfection and the sense wherein I received and wherein I do receive and teach to this day." Mr. Wesley continued to the last, to exhort all with whom he held intercourse, to go on to perfection. Volume VII, page 238, To Mr. John Booth, January 20, 1791: "Whenever you have the opportunity of speaking to believers, urge them to go on to perfection, spare no pains; and God, our own God, will give you his blessing." He departed this life March 1, 1791.

If Mr. Wesley did not enjoy that blessing, how could he give such specific instruction to seekers of sanctification, and why did he continue to urge it upon believers, to within a few days of the end of his earthly existence, and how could he decide upon the case of those fourteen of whom he believed they were not deceived? If Mr. Wesley had not attained to this perfection, after so long a life of unselfish devotion to the service of God, and his fellow-men; well might ordinary Christians doubt their reaching that point until death shall end the strife.

Temperance.

MR. EDITOR: We read with much pleasure and profit, the able report of the Temperance Committee, appointed by our Conference at its last session; and we rejoice that Louisiana Conference is about to memorialize our State Legislature on this very important subject.

We will not now discuss the propriety of asking legislation in this direction. There is always legislation on this subject, but it is mostly on the wrong side. It legalizes the manufacture, importation, and traffic, in these fire waters of death; when we think that law should simply forbid these fearful acts; and thus, at once, save to the people these millions of money, and save them from these millions of heartaches, these millions of rags, tears, wretchedness and ruin. We want no gallon law, no "pint law," like our sister State Mississippi. Why, that law runs the glass factories day and night, making bottles, and puts a pint bottle into the pocket of nearly every boy and young man in the State, and makes it his constant companion.

On reading this report, our hearts are burdened, and we inquire what can be done? "Why," says one, "pass a prohibition law." All right, if we could do it. "Ask the Legislature to do it, or to let the people, the voters do it." But who are our legislators? Who are the people, but the very people who consume these rivers of rum? Think you that they will vote for prohibition? Must they not be converted from the bottle to cold water? On this subject, the committee seems more despondent than we are. Hear it:

"We are of the opinion that at the present time there is such a depraved appetite, both inherited and imbibed, for artificial stimulants, and so much money in their manufacture and traffic, that nothing less than a national prohibition, backed by a healthy public sentiment, can ever arrest the mighty tide of this evil." The tide is too high, the current too mighty, the stream too immense in its proportions and too overwhelming in its course to be arrested by moral suasion or by the cold process of intellectual reasoning."

Now, we must differ from the committee. It seems to us that it must be done, and can be done, and can only be done by "reasoning," and "suasion." The Committee puts the prohibition first. True, the report would have it "backed by a healthy public sentiment." That would be well enough, if we could have it so, but the public sentiment must come first, far without it we can not get the legislation. And how shall the proper sentiment be obtained without the reasoning and suasion? "Come and let us reason together."

The question then is, how can this public sentiment be created? We reply; first, let all lovers of humanity think about it, and pray over it, and ask God to help in this matter. Let them persuade the men, women and children to "touch not, taste not, handle not;" and let all the preachers dwell somewhat on the "woe unto him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's mouth."

But there is so much dram drinking, so much, even of drunkenness in and out of the church, that the preacher can not say enough about it in the pulpit to cure the evil. He must preach the gospel, Christ and him crucified, and not turn all of his sermons into temperance lectures. Then, let a time be set apart for this purpose. Let the simplest form of temperance societies be constructed, and let the hour be devoted to temperance talk, lectures, etc.

We have belonged to a variety of temperance societies; the Washingtonian, the Sons, the Social Circle, the Friends, the Murphy, etc., and we think the later, or something like it, the most successful.

Let there be no initiation fee, no monthly dues, no quarterly dues, no mysterious ceremonies, no wonderful secrets; and let everybody be invited to attend. Let there be a public lecture at every meeting and men, women, and children invited to join the society. Have officers, good order, prayer to begin with at least, to close with prayer or a benediction. Have a pledge, of course, say something like this:

"PLEDGE."

"We, the undersigned, do hereby pledge ourselves, God helping us, to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, and to discourage the use of them in others."

And then, with kindness, patience and perseverance, we shall succeed.

Louisiana has a good local option law. As soon as a majority of the voters in the corporation will do it, have an election and enforce prohibition. By and by the entire State will prohibit, either through its Legislature or its various corporations, and the monster will hide in his polluted den and die of his own sting.

We have seen it tried in Jackson, La., and its vicinity with wonderful success. Public confidence was restored, peace and good order prevailed and in eight or nine months Centenary College doubled its number of pupils, and now, also, the female colleges prosper and we are another people. O, what a deliverance! The results of temperance efforts may be seen in the parishes of St. Helena, Washington, etc., and I am assured by one whose ministerial duties call him to ride all over this region, once a quarter, that there is far less drinking and drunkenness in the Florida parishes than in former years. We are gaining ground in this region. May it not be so all over the State? And when we petition the Legislature, may not the apples be ripe and all into the lap of our lovely Louisiana?

A. C. MILLER.

From California.

This is the seventh day of February and vegetation is as far advanced here as it usually is in April in Mississippi. Wife and myself spent part of the afternoon on the front portico looking at the beautiful flowers; and growing shrubbery in our yard.

Bishop Kavanaugh has been with us a few days, and his opinion is that earth has no spot more lovely than Santa Clara Valley. I agree with the Bishop in this thing. The earth is rich, easy to till and yields bountifully every year. In all of my knowledge, there is not a house of lender or any kind of improvement that is not in good condition. Every thing of this kind seems to be new in this country; and every farm and house in town or country has some one to take care of them. We have one advantage here, timber will last much longer than in the Southern States.

We make a fence here by driving stakes, eight or ten inches in the ground leaving five or six feet above, stock will not go over it. I asked a gentleman how long these stakes would last, he inquired me that he did not know, for no one had been long enough in California to see them decay. The paint on houses here will look bright and new longer than in any country I know of. This climate is wonderful for health (I mean this Valley) and in keeping all our eatables sweet and sound; canned fruits and vegetables will keep for years. While I admit the climate has much to do with any country, and the prosperity of the people, yet climate will not do all. The people must work. I think the climate of this part of California is better than that of Mississippi, but in some things the latter is superior. There is no people on earth that I love as I do those of Mississippi, yet I think I can see why many of them are so poor. If we had the population of California with their notions and habits of life in Mississippi, that State would blossom as the rose in less than ten years. How many men in Mississippi, worth from one to two hundred thousand dollars, will plow, drive a team, or do anything else about a farm? If there, I have never seen them. But you can see them anytime here, and nothing thought of it. We have wealthy ladies here who do their own house work, cooking and all, and seem perfectly happy and contented. In one sense Californians are pleased men and women, ready to take hold of any kind of business that is honorable to make a living. I well remember that during the two years that I was at Grove Street, Vicksburg, only one man came to me to get him work, but fifty or more came and asked me to aid them in getting business. The people here ask for work, the word business is not often heard. When I speak of people working here I do not mean that class of hirelings that float through the country, for they are no better than the negroes of Mississippi, but I mean the people who won the land of this country. A lady came over the other day to see us, she said that all their farm was planted in wheat, and the boys were out plowing for their neighbors, this lady would be considered rich in Mississippi. I know that it is hard for the people of the cotton States to take hold of work, but business but they will have it to do, and the sooner the better. I can see plainly, and my heart pains me to know it, that every year brings a little more poverty to these States. The bottom is not reached yet. I hope not to discourage any one, but facts are stubborn things, we do all we can as they are. There is nothing the matter with these States, the only thing wanting is work. We must learn that it is elegant to plow, pick cotton, drive teams or do anything of the kind much more elegant to have a good living this way, than to be poverty stricken. Now this is plain talk, but it is the only prescription that I can give that will cure the ills of the South. May God prosper the people of my beloved Mississippi in things pertaining to this life, and the life to come.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE CLARIOSOPHIC SOCIETY.

Last night a large and attentive audience assembled at the College to celebrate the Sixty-first Anniversary of the Clariosophic Literary Society. The Clariosophic Society was founded in the year 1820, and, through the long period of its existence, it has never failed to enlighten and entertain the audiences which have assembled in it hall. May it ever be as useful and ornamental to the South as it has been. As I said before, this was the Sixty-first Anniversary, and, in honor of that event, an orator and four debaters had been chosen. The exercises began at 8 o'clock, Prof. C. W. Verdel, of this city, presiding. The band struck up a lively piece of music, at the close of which, the audience were led in prayer by the Rev. Dr. Lewis, president of this college. After the music, which followed the prayer, was ended, the president announced as orator of the occasion, Mr. E. W. de Graffenried, of this city. Mr. de Graffenried is an A. M. graduate of this college, and, while here, was one of the most elegant and powerful debaters of the Clariosophic Society. He ably acquitted himself in this address before the Society, and, judging by his past and present life, I predict a bright future to this young "follower of Blackstone."

Next came the debate. The question was, Is the South Destined to be the Most Prosperous Section of the Union? The debaters of the affirmation side were, Messrs. G. W. Terry, of Marion, Ala., and G. W. Hill, of Gainsville, Ala. Those on the negative side were, Messrs. J. H. Welch, of Mobile, Ala., and J. R. Morris, of Whistler, Ala. I will not discuss the manner in which the debaters delivered their speeches; suffice it to say that they did justice to themselves, and brought additional honor to the Society which they represented. The debaters having finished the president arose to give his decision. After making a few timely remarks about the manner in which the question had been discussed, he gave his decision in favor of the negative, but said they barely won it. After the music which followed the president's decision, the exercises were closed with the benediction.

Long may the Clariosophic Society stand against the ravages of time; may its Alumni prove bright and shining lights, and may they never forget the teachings inculcated within its walls.

"Within half a century," says Dr. Dio Lewis, "no young man addicted to the use of tobacco has graduated at the head of his class in Harvard College, though five out of six of the students have used it. The chances, you see, were five in six that a smoker would graduate at the head of his class. If tobacco does no harm. But during half a century but one eighth of tobacco was able to come out ahead."

MY BETHEL

BY INVALID.

I have watched the crown of glory fading on the brow of day
See the "day-god's" vouch of purple, draped with twilight's curtains gray
Till the rosy blush of sunset paled, and thro' the silver bars
Gleamed a thousand dazzling jewels, countless hosts of beaming stars
Thro' the mystic twilight shadows, softly tinged with golden light,
With the eye of faith or fancy, I can see the robes of white
Of the angels, while descending from the "ladder" of pure gold,
Coming to my humble "Bethel," as to Israel's of old.
I can almost hear the rustle of their spotless wings of white,
Almost see the holy radiance of their starry crowns of light,
As they come to bring a message from the shining courts above,
Breathing sweetest words of comfort telling of the Savjour's love.
"Peace I give thee of the Spirit—not the peace of earth," he says,
And my grace shall be sufficient for the remnant of thy days."
Yet a little while I leave thee, but the Comforter I'll send,
Till I come to make my jewels, and the things of time shall end.
Yes, by faith I see the angels, and the shining way of light,
Leading to the holy city, where no filth shall ever blight
And the brightness of his glory dothes me on my night of gloom,
Fills with splendor my lone Bethel, makes a palace of my room
Humble as the Saviour built the place where he first manifested
In the humble stable "Bethel" where I linger, watch and pray
Where my heart of worldly noise weary, longing gaze
Here beneath the cross I nestle, here my Bethel I will raise.
With its sacred shall water me, I have laid me down to rest
And I will not fear the cleave me till my spirit shall have blessed.
Here alone I love to meet thee, God of Israel to commune
Out of stony grief and anguish I have here my Bethel raised.

Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. GEO. C. ROPER.

First Quarter Lesson XII.

GOLDEN TEXT: It must needs happen, but woe to the man by whom the offense cometh. Matthew xviii. 7.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20. LUKE XXIV. 36-53.

41 And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me.

45 Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures,

46 And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day:

47 And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.

48 And ye are witnesses of these things.

49 And, behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.

50 And he led them out as far as to Bethany, and he lifted up his hands, and blessed them.

51 And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven.

52 And they worshiped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy:

53 And were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God. Amen.

When Christ arose from the grave and appeared to his disciples, he found great difficulty in convincing them that he was really himself. His sudden appearance, coming into a room when the doors were shut, and his sudden disappearance, miraculously, that is, not according to any ordinary law of bodily motion, terrified them; they supposed they saw a spirit, from the sudden, noiseless and mysterious appearance of the Lord, when no door had opened to admit him. Even his "peace be with you" was not enough to calm their terror. To convince them of his identity, and that he was the very same Jesus, and not a spirit, he let them handle him, he ate with them, and he showed them his hands and feet. This risen body of your Lord was the same in which he suffered, in which he ascended, and in which he now sitteth at the right hand of God. Behold the pledge that we, too, in our flesh shall see God.

He first convinced them of his resurrection, and then he began to teach them by opening their understandings, that they might understand the Scriptures. This must always be the first lesson: "Christ is risen." This introduces into the lesson the teachings of the risen Christ during the forty days he remained on earth after his resurrection.

Verse 44. "These are the words;" that is, this is the fulfillment of the words. When Christ had told them that all things written of him in the Old Testament must be fulfilled they had not understood how much his words meant. He now shows them that all the strange and startling events they had lately witnessed, his sufferings, his death and his resurrection, were a perfect fulfillment of ancient prophecy.

Verse 45. He opened their understandings by opening the Scriptures. Christ must have been the best expositor of the Scriptures. He had much to do in making them, and was himself the solution of their mysteries, the antitype of all their types, and the unifying principle that made them one harmonious truth. He could explain, and at the same time furnish the scholar with spiritual intelligence to comprehend his teachings.

"The entrance of thy word giveth light." Christ opened the word so that they might enter, and opened their heads and hearts so that the word might enter.

Verse 46. It behooved Christ to suffer; that is, it was needful that Christ should suffer; needful; that is, in fulfillment of prophecy. So our Lord asks in verse 26, "Ought not Christ to have suffered?" There is no allusion to the necessity of suffering as a factor in the plan of redemption, but to the prophecy. He must suffer if he would fulfill the prophecies.

Verse 47. Repentance and remission of sins. Repentance is the cry of the forerunner; it is the cry of the Saviour, and it must be the preaching of the church to the end. It is the first step of the sinner toward the Saviour. Faith is repentance in its culmination. Repentance and faith go together; they are inseparable. Repentance culminates and fruits into faith, and faith drops its seed and new repentance springs up; along with repentance is remission of sins; that is pardon or forgiveness of sins. It is closely connected with repentance, for true repentance wins the grace of pardon, but only "in his name;" that is, through faith in him. The gospel uses faith sometimes as the absolute condition, and sometimes repentance; there is no genuine repentance that does not end in faith, and no genuine faith that does not produce repentance; so both of these graces are indispensable to remission of sins.

"Among all nations." The gospel must be preached in all lands. A church cannot be faithful that neglects this command. An anti-missionary church is an anti-Christian church. The church that does not do at least as much for giving the gospel to the rest of the world as it does for itself will incur the charge of selfishness, and will be called unprofitable servants. It will go hard with that church in the day of judgment. When God gives his opinion on foreign missions it is time for men to be silent, and accept his command and obey it.

"Beginning at Jerusalem," because it was God's will that the offer of salvation should be made to the Jews first, and only afterwards to the Gentiles.

Verse 48. "And ye are witnesses of these things." To be a competent witness you must know for yourself; you must see and hear with your own eyes and ears. Only such men could be witnesses, and such were all the apostles. You and I must be witnesses, but our testimony for Christ will not be heard unless we know that Christ is risen, know it by conversion, and even then our testimony will be worth nothing unless we sustain a good moral character. If you want to be a witness of Jesus you must maintain a good character, or nobody will listen to you.

Verse 49. The promise of my Father was the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, by whose descent upon them they were to be endued; that is, clothed "with power from on high." The promise of the Holy Ghost was God's special promise; it is his latest and best gift to you and me. The promise was kept on the day of Pentecost, ten days after Christ's ascension.

They waited in Jerusalem until this great gift was bestowed upon them, as they were commanded, ten days of waiting. I wonder if any of them faltered and wavered during this time of waiting a long time to wait. Perhaps without Christ and the Holy Spirit, what a time of trial for their faith.

Verse 50. "He led them out as far as to Bethany, and while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven." Our Lord's last act on earth is to bless. Even as he ascends his hands are stretched out in blessing, and we may think of him still in his parting attitude, for from the right hand of God he is evermore shedding down his blessings on the church. He was carried up not by any other power than that of his own divine will.

It was this wondrous exaltation of our incarnate God to the throne of glory that David, in his vision, beheld, when he saw one like the Son of man, who came to the Ancient of Days and they brought him near before him. It was of this triumphal return of the Saviour to the highest heaven that the Psalmist sang: "Lift up your heads, oh, ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the king of glory shall come in." And again: "Thou art gone up on high, thou hast led captivity captive, and received gifts for men." The Holy Spirit's presence, and all his offices to men, were the gifts for men.

Verse 52. Worshiped him as truly God, exalted to the right hand of the Father. It is of infinite importance we should think of our ascended Lord in his two-fold nature as still in heaven, perfect man and perfect God. Thither he carried up our human nature, forever glorified in him, and so he is one who can pity and feel for us. He has exalted the hope of our humanity beyond all height, so that we may see how that yet "in my flesh I shall see God." There, too, he sits in his divine glory, the object of worship and adoration. "The Lord's seat is in heaven; his eyes consider the poor; his eyelids try the children of men."

They returned with great joy. How could they longer doubt their Lord's power and glory? He had said to them: "If ye loved me ye would rejoice, because I said, I go to my Father;" and now they had seen him go to his Father, and thus their joy was fulfilled. What a cause for continual praise and gratitude, and so they were found continually in the temple, praising and blessing God.

Livingston Parish, Louisiana.

This part of the Mississippi Conference is known as Livingston mission, comprising, as it does, the entire parish. It is composed of eight regular appointments, affording a broad field for usefulness, and a vast and difficult territory to travel over.

This is my second year in this State; also the second on Livingston mission. There are many very serious embarrassments here, the most prominent of which is the want of competent and faithful, true and godly men as religious teachers. We have many refined, good and excellent people, many who cannot be excelled in their efforts and usefulness. The pure and noble women of this charge especially deserve great commendation. But we need true and godly men to superintend and teach in Sabbath-school, to lead in prayer meetings, and to aid the preacher in his administrations.

There can be found nowhere any people that will excel our people here in kindness, hospitality and liberality. A more anxious, eager and willing people for a general upbuilding of the church, the spread of Christianity, and true and vital piety, can be found nowhere.

This country has been almost ruined in the past by "false teachers," ignorant and ungodly men, some even assuming the ministry. But they and their doctrine have in most places been discarded. The Bible is being read, and inquiry made into the way of truth and life.

Much has been done here in the last year for the Master. Churches and Sunday-schools have been organized and successfully carried on, houses of worship built, and a general interest in the work manifested. Much remains to be done. Thousands need yet to be brought to a saving knowledge of Jesus. But if we can have true, godly and intelligent ministers and teachers in this country it will not be long until this can be, and faultless, will be a self-sustaining and prosperous work.

The chief sources of livelihood are confined to the swamps, along the water courses, so prevalent here, the timber, wood, shingle and lumber business being the most profitable. This country abounds in water courses, some of which are navigable. Now in this writing one can go almost anywhere he chooses in a canoe, the most of the entire parish being under water. I am now surrounded by water in all sides; can go only a short distance on horseback, and that attended with much difficulty and danger. Nearly half of my work is utterly inaccessible, and I fear that when the waters go down the numerous gross-ways and bridges will be left in such a condition as to be impassable.

Taking all things into consideration, the excessive cold, rain and snow, mud and water I have not been able to accomplish much so far this year.

We need more Advocates and good, useful literature here, and I have been and am yet laboring to that end. We need enterprise, and the necessary facilities for education and religion. We have but little use for juries and courts in this country. The lawyers can find but little to do here, there being no tramps, or dead-heads; and thieves, robbers and incendiaries are not known. In fact, there is less drunkenness, outrage and crime here than in any country I ever saw.

The people here are true and honest even to a fault. Every one attends to his own affairs, and interferes with no body. We have all classes and grades of society, and all kinds of creeds and sects of religious faith, except Jews. They cannot find a place here. Spiritualism, Hardshellism and Shushellism, of course, are a reproach to any country.

I am told that this is a lovely country in the summer, and at all seasons when dry; but I can only speak from experience. I have never seen it dry. One thing I do know: the kindness of the people cannot be drowned.

LIVINGSTON, LA., Feb. 14, 1881.

Our Danger.

MR. EDITOR: The fact that I have to apprehensions for the future of Methodism, is by no means a guarantee of her continuance with men. But if she should die, the fact that her wholesome doctrines have captured the pulpits of her sisters is an assurance that her works will live after her. If built on the true foundation, this shall be her glory; if on the false, I hope she will be saved as by fire. One thing is sure, no Methodist was ever driven to the humiliating task of masking the doctrines of his church for the sake of success, or of quiet, in any community. Wherever you find a Methodist preacher you will hear a faithful exposition of the faith and practice of Christian life as held by his church. Our creed is as open to inspection and comparison with revealed truth as is the solar light—the sun of day. But I think of her improvements as the young ladies do of the fashions, the latest are the best.

The fact is the only real changes I see to Methodism is from the relics of that delectable past. That old pioneer plan, good in its day, of preaching wherever a dozen people could be assembled, did not pass away with footpaths and market wagons when railroads and carriages came in vogue. If there ever was a class of men distinguished for moral heroism in devotion to God and man it is the modern circuit preachers. If the Lord Jesus should visit some communities in person, I imagine he would say: "Woe unto you also, ye Methodist! for ye lade your ministers with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers."

Unfinished houses of worship, three and four miles apart, where the preacher meets twenty and thirty hearers, and gets as many dollars for his support, with a whole year's abuse for not giving eight or a dozen such appointments a whole Sabbath and a week's visitation in each month, are some of his trials. For the most part these people have conveyances, and follow their pastor from place to place, and could easily concentrate on some central point, build a good house, and pay the preacher, if it were not for their graveyards, which must be kept up at the expense of the pastor's time, living and energies. Is there any wonder that our circuit preachers strive to secure homes, that with their own hands they may supplement these meager salaries? Our brethren in the country must correct this evil in themselves, or else suffer the consequences of an evil that they see and know is increasing every year from a semi-local pastorate.

Again: It is not unfrequent that the location and style of our houses of worship in the towns and cities make it exceedingly difficult for our pastors to come up to the full measure of expectation. We well know that the measure of our success in the swell-rounded duties of the pastorate is also the measure of the value placed on us by the church. To be sent to serve a church badly situated and worse neglected, and know that you are expected to successfully contend with other churches and pastors in full tone, is a position that fills the head and heart with aches. Or, if your church is well situated, it has every appearance of a house that belongs to the forty years ago, while the churches of the other denominations look new and fresh. Possibly it was the best house in town when our grandfathers built it; but, as wealth and intelligence increased, one after another of these old-time houses gave place to better, until the dear old Methodist church is the only relic of times that once were, but will be no more.

These things loose to us our children and friends, and lay upon our preachers burdens hard to be borne. Ask them to build better, and you are answered with "this is good enough, or we are not able." "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled house, and this house lie waste?" Haggai i. There are other dangers plain to me, but I must not ask further indulgence of the editor.

WEMYSS.

William H. Watkins, D. D.

MR. EDITOR: My heart is sad. I have heard through a private letter that dear Bro. Watkins is dead. It would have been mournful pleasure to me could I have been with him in his last moments, and caught his words of cheer as he entered the port of bliss.

As yet I know not the day he died; the word I have is that he is dead; neither know I anything of his last moments, but yet I know how he died, because I know how he lived.

When I read the sentence that he was gone I could but exclaim: How can we do without him? Yet our Father in heaven knows best, and we must submit to his will. So if we, his brethren, in the ministry, know not how to give him up, how can his dear wife and children do without him? Thank Heaven for the precious promise: God will care for the widow and orphan.

Of all the men that I have been associated with in the ministry none are freer from selfishness than Dr. William H. Watkins was. He was transparent, nothing hidden; his heart was wholly his friends knew and felt it. He was not a strange or curious man. He was the same every day, all the time, and always right. He may have had his weak points, but, if so, they were so fortified by grace that they were hardly perceptible.

As a wise counselor, I never had a better one, and with his fine judgment, you could see his noble heart, too. As a husband and father none could be his superior, and but few his equal. I would that I could pay a befitting tribute to our departed brother, for certain it is that a great and good man is gone from among us.

Though three thousand miles from the scene of sadness, yet my heart mingles with the sorrow that I know is in that household. And, while they weep, I too must join them in their tears, though far away from them.

May his mantle fully fall on the beloved preacher boy, and the mantle continue in our Mississippi Conference. May our Father gently lead the sorrowing wife and children through life's paths, and then to the home above.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF MRS. S. RICHERT.

TO THE BEREAVED.

BY MRS. MARIA T. PIPKIN.

There's a shadow in your doorway,
And gloom broods round the hearth,
Where I was wont to list to tones,
Of voices tuned to mirth;
But I turned with weary sorrow,
From the all-pervading gloom,
Only to find its presence,
Its chill in every room.
It lingers all around the place,
For one dear Angel's there;
And I can feel the shadow's trace
Of her presence everywhere.
Her rocker's in the same old place
The corner near the kirk—
But I do not see her basket,
With the pieces of her work.
If that were only by her chair,
Her scissors on the floor,
I'd soon expect her steps to hear
Within the open door,
And hasten to meet the cordial clasp
Of hands with friendship warm,
And greet, with loving tenderness,
Her well-beloved form.
But her rocker has an unused look,
Her basket is not there,
And I hear no sound of foot-fall
Upon the chilling air.
For God hath called your dear one home,
To join the throng above,
Of angels who are ministers
To those blest with his love.
Ah! we have but her memory,
To hold without a stain,
That's set to music in our hearts,
A sad, but sweet, refrain.
To fill our souls with gratitude,
That she doth bear the palm
Of victory as she joins the song
Of praises to the I AM.

Obituaries.

REV. G. W. CHATTERTON was born in Wilkes county, Georgia, [illegible], 1811. Died at Natchez, Mississippi, February [illegible], 1881.

His first marriage was to Adaline Youngest, child of William and Nancy Johnson, of Wilkes county, Georgia. She preceded him to the land of the good about eight years. Six children were left behind to mourn their loss. He married again November 17, 1870, to Mrs. Susan M. Wade, who was a faithful friend and companion to him during his years and during his several afflictions. The Chatterton deceased belonged to a family of note in the State of Georgia, and he himself was a man of talents and influence. He was appointed judge of one of the courts of that State and also served one term as a representative in the State Legislature. But it was soon discovered that a higher calling than the legal profession and the politician were his genius. The eye of the church was soon upon him as a person to preach the everlasting gospel. He felt the spirit call, and he obeyed, and about the year 1840 was licensed. He moved to Alabama, and was for other years presiding elder of Oak Bowery, Tuskaloosa, Talladega and Jacksonville districts. He was also professor in the college at Auburn. In 1854, he removed to Mississippi, and taught a very flourishing school at Carrollsville. He was faithful and efficient local preacher, till 1858, when he joined the Mississippi Conference and devoted his whole time to the work of the ministry. He remained in the traveling connection four years, filling acceptably the various charges to which he was assigned by the Conference. He then retired to the local work, and settled at Newton, Miss., where he organized a Methodist church in a small tenement with about seven members. Now there is a good house of worship with a large membership. He also organized the church at Lake. In 1878 he was a supply on the Newton circuit, and served it as faithfully as his physical ability would allow. For the space of about the last two years, Mr. Chatterton was under the treatment of several physicians, and was confined upon bed of sickness. His death was not unexpected. He was ready and waiting. He had to contend more or less, of all who know him. The [illegible] soon after he came to the work last year, and found in him a brother and a faithful co-laborer. The church and community sustain a heavy loss. In my visits to him I could hear him calmly and resigned, and note of his sun was setting, richly and gradually and when standing on the margin of the river, and the power of speech was gone, I asked him, "If all was still well with him," and repeating a portion of that sweet hymn: "Jesus, lover of my soul," a heavenly radiance kindled on his face, he bowed his head and passed over safely. May God comfort the widow, and bless his sons and daughters, and those who have left to them such a rich legacy in the life and virtues of an honored father.

C. CANNON.

At the Fourth Quarterly Conference of the Uniontown station, Alabama Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the following resolution was appointed to prepare a suitable memorial of Rev. Wm. N. Sears, a local preacher in said church. The following was adopted by the First Quarterly Conference, January 30, 1881:

REV. WM. N. SEARS was born in the State of North Carolina, March 2, 1820; baptized and converted by Rev. Joseph Travis; he was married twice; his first wife lived but a short time after her marriage, and he subsequently married Mary J. C. Cone, March 4, 1840; he was licensed to preach June 3, 1843, and joined the traveling connection at [illegible], Georgia, in 1849, and was sent to Louisiana, the same year; thence to Georgia, to Marianna and Florida, 1851; to Escambia circuit, Florida, and Alabama, 1852; mission to Stewart and Pilgrim's Rest, 1853; to Marion, Ala., 1854; to Washington circuit, Alabama Conference, and in the same year of that year he located and settled in Montgomery county, Ala., where he remained to Macon county, Ala., 1858; where he resided till his death, November 18, 1880. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Andrew, and in due time he was ordained elder by Bishop Early, December 15, 1855, at Montgomery, Ala. His inconsolable wife, an only daughter, several grandchildren, with numerous friends, lament his death. Being afflicted with illness in the fall, he suffered much, but he bore his sufferings with Christian fortitude and patience, frequently expressing his assurance of a happy immortality in heaven when released from his sufferings on earth.

Resolved, That we bow in humble submission to the will of Almighty God to remove our beloved brother from his labors and sufferings on earth to his reward in heaven; therefore,

Resolved, That while we deeply regret the loss of his presence and labors, we humbly submit to the action of Him who doeth not err in doing wrong.

Resolved, That we tender to his bereaved family and friends our Christian sympathy.

Resolved, That a copy of the above be furnished the New Orleans and Nashville Christian Advocates for publication, and also sent to his bereaved family.

JOHN PERRY, for Committee.

MARY A. ROBERTS was born in South Carolina, in 1812, and died in Jackson county, Mississippi, January 22, 1880.

She was married to James Roberts, in Mobile county, Ala., in 1830, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1869.

After she joined the church, she was one of its best members. She was not a person to make any great pretensions, but was always at her post, doing what soever her hands found to do. She was the mother of thirteen children, and lived to see them all join the Methodist Church. Two of her sons are local preachers, and are doing all they can for the salvation of men. Sister Roberts was one of the best women I have ever known; her children, no doubt, will rise up in the judgment and call her blessed; for it was her good advice and godly example, no doubt, that caused them to embrace the religion that now gives them so much pleasure. It has been frequently remarked, by those who are acquainted with the family, that had it not been for the mother, that the children would not have been such noble men and women as they are. The children all loved their mother, and always looked to her for advice, and when in trouble they went to her for comfort.

A few weeks before she died, she visited all her children, as it was her wish to visit them about once a year, and now since she is dead, her last visit is very much appreciated. We are thankful that such a noble woman was vouchsafed to us so long; we must now submissively recognize the [illegible] than to thine and heaven's.

MRS. MARY JONES, nee Whittaker, [illegible] of Col. Carter Jones, of North Carolina, [illegible] monly know by all as "Grandma Jones," died [illegible] Warren county, Mississippi, November 15, [illegible] in the ninety-third year of her age. She was born in Halifax county, North Carolina, April 19, 1788; was married to Col., and Rev. Carter Jones, December 18, 1810.

She was bereaved of her husband in 1857, after [illegible] three years of married life, since which time she [illegible] made her home among her children, of which she has a large family. Of a family of ten children [illegible] were raised to maturity, save two. Five yet remain, with also a large connection of grand and great-grand-children, to mourn her loss. When grandma first attached herself to the Church of Christ, is not known to any of the present generation, her membership dating from her young womanhood. True her life was [illegible] that of the righteous, "shining more and more unto the perfect day."

Bro. and Sister Jones may be classed among the early settlers of Warren county, Miss., where they spent a life of usefulness in the local ranks of the Methodist Church. She at the same time placed herself a helpmeet indeed, in all things at home, and in the surrounding community. The last few years of her life have been days of physical weakness [illegible] who would not, under a load of ninety-two years [illegible] in spirit and faith she has only grown ripe and riper for the Angelic Reaper. She feared death, all was well, and stood with lamp trimmed and burning, and an abundance of oil in her vessel.

Raleigh, North Carolina, Advocate please copy.

ALVIRIA E. ELLIS, the noble subject of this obituary, was born in Jackson county, Mississippi, January 27, 1854, and died in the same county and State, January 13, 1881.

She was the daughter of Mr. Samuel and Mrs. Syrilla Davis, and was married to Mr. G. L. Ellis, August 1, '71. Joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, soon after she was married. She occupied a place in the church that can not be easily filled.

She was the mother of five children, two of whom preceded her to the grave, the other three are able to answer the question asked by Mary [illegible] "Have you a good mother?"

I have been sister Ellis's pastor for [illegible] and I have never known a person more [illegible] God, she loved best and God, people [illegible] reflected in her favorite theme.

We do not weep as those who have no hope, we can say, take one to old, the Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved family our deepest sympathy in their great affliction, and commend them to the God who can alone comfort and console.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the family of the deceased, and a copy of the New Orleans Christian Advocate and Christian Advocate.

MRS. SARAH EDMONDS, after a protracted illness, attended with much physical suffering, quietly passed from this world, on the twenty-third of January, 1881, at her home in Tallahassee.

During the several years of her connection with our church here, she testified her absolution to Master by a uniformly pious life, and a consistent dependence upon the promises of God. Her faith in the Saviour of sinners grew stronger as death approached and she was not left comfortless.

LITTLE JIMMIE HANCYCUFF, oldest son of John L. and Sallie Hancycuff, died at Thursday, February 3, 1881, of congestion of the [illegible] aged eight years and seven months.

It is with a sad heart, that we are called upon to record the death of our generous-hearted and manly little friend, yet we have the comforting assurance that he has gone to join the "angel band" and be one in that innumbered host of sabbath-school scholars, "who are his jewels precious jewels," his loved and his own."

To the afflicted parents, around whose hearts are entwined the warm affections of their dear boy, we would commend this consolation to be drawn from his word, and remember that, though he can not come to them, they can go to him.

JAMES L., son of James H. and H. E. Morris, died at Gosport, Clarke county, Ala. He was born July 8, 1877, and died May 27, 1880.

Jimmy was a bright child, the hope and joy of fond mother and grandparents. His father was called from earth to a home a few months before. When he was taken sick he was on a visit to his grandmother, and requested to be taken home to his mother, and said then that he would go to heaven and see his papa. Bright and intelligent as he was, loved so well by relatives and friends, yet God saw best that it was best to take him to himself. His sweet voice is now hushed, but he is glorified in heaven. What an additional motive the bereaved have to be devoted to God and his cause.

OPEN IMMEDIATELY.

BY MARGARET J. PRESTON.

e earnestest, surest thing I know.
Whatever, what else, may yet befall ressing or blame, of want or woe, the truth that is fulfullest far of all
n the Master will knock at my door some night, and there, in the silence hushed and dim,
I wait for my coming with hoop aright,
to open immediately to Him.

ander if I, at his tap, shall spring
n eagerness up, and cross the floor
th rapturous step, and freely fling, the mark of life aside right, wide the door will there be work to be put away?
r the taper, that burns so low, to trim?
something that craves too much delay to go immediately to Him?

hall I with withered fear grow dumb,
the moment I hear the sudden knock,
started to think he tomb surely come,
half falter and fail to find the lock—keep him so waiting, as I stand rembling, while my senses swim, nd of the bound with outstretched hand,
open immediately to Him?

e is the only thing forbid:
all my future—then I pray, quietly watchful, I may hold he key of a golden faith each day short—may grasp, that when I hear a step, be it dawn or midnight time, ight or may I rise without a fear,
nd open immediately to Him!

The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.

BY JAMES A. LAFFOON, PASTOR PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, OXFORD, MISS.

rily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven
nto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith ever they shall blaspheme: But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: be-use they said, He hath an unclean spirit.—Mark

The text was uttered by Christ during his sacred journey through Galilee. e chief priests, Scribes, and Pharis s, though versed in the prophecies, re, as everywhere, reviled, opposed, rejected and rejected a Christ. With nignant and persistent hatred, they dogged his steps from Jerusalem, king to malign his motives and de- me his character, and so keep the peo- from believing in him.

They called him "a wine-bibber, glutton," "a friend of publicans d sinners." They assail his doctrine, d even call his miracle see Matt. 9: 32 which afforded such a con- ncing illustration of his divine mission work of the devil.

The subject of the miracle was a per- t illustration of the ruin effected by n. He was blind, deaf, dumb, and lemonaic. To revile such a display divine power and love, and call it e work of an unclean devil, was, on e part of those religious teachers, a against light. It showed a persist- t malignity inconceivable. Bear in d that this charge called forth this ost solemn and awful word of our rd. He exposes the folly and incon- stency of their charge (Matt. xiii: 27); he exposes these spiritual guides fore the multitude, who, in their un- tered simplicity, trusted them. His rds, enforced by the miracle, would ep away the foolish sophistry of the arge.

At the same time, he sets before the- ers the fearful nature of the sin hich they had well-nigh, if not alto- ther, committed, and its awful doom: hath not remission to eternity, is sub- ct to eternal punishment. The context, well as the Greek, shows this. The eclaims of the text emphasizes this. he committor of this not-to-be-remit- ble sin is actually subject to eternal damnation.

This was not a sin of the common ople, but of the Scribes (see Mark iii: , who came down from Jerusalem, d who deliberately and persistently ed against the clearest light. The n was not only a malignant rejection Christ, but an impeachment of his ission, as set forth, in epitome, in the racle they had just witnessed.

This sin had its origin in peculiar cir- mstances, and can only be committed those who sin maliciously, daringly d wilfully. It can not be simply ersistent unbelief, then it would be ssible of the finally impenitent. The y to the text hangs on the last clause. The sin is not simply rejection of rist, nor blaspheming Christ and his rk; it is connected directly with the ly Spirit and his work; it is a dar- g blasphemy of his person and work; is something special, public, deliber e and malicious, and which seals the ther's doom at once. Some say it d only be committed when our Lord s on earth working miracles. Still, e there not fearful approaches, at least, it in our day? Men speak slightingly of the regenerating work of the Holy host, and scoff at revivals and call r preachers fanatics, and their work anic, so, too, men who grieve the oly Spirit. This was the sin of Israel ho vexed the Holy One.

This sin, as set before us in the inci- nt of the text, is a man's deliberate ejection and blaspheming all the com- passionate efforts of the Godhead for his salva- on. With his own hand he thrusts side the provisions of the Gospel, in- oring him away who applies them. necessity, then, it is a sin that hath d forgiveness to eternity. Hence, there no restoration or future repentance. his is the very thing precluded in the ord clause of verse 29. The best au- orities give here the common word sin, instead of the word damnation. he rendering, "sin danger of," is too eak. The Greek means, not only "ex- osed to" a certain danger, but "held der" the evil power—i. e., sin. Those uds of sin no sinner, of himself, ever reaks only by the Holy Ghost. When compels the Spirit to abandon him, s held by these bonds forever. He ver will repent, and so never be for- ven. This is the undoubted meaning the text. To such there is no hope rever of annihilation or repentance, d forgiveness and restoration.

Believe not, then, the Holy Spirit. That n may not, receive and obey the Christ; whom, he witnesses. Despise not, r scoff at his work.

How much need of this now, when many deride and mock at the most mm truths of God, and speak with reverence and flippancy and jest of the dem and awful awards of eternity! here this is done intelligently and ilfully, it ceases to be a sin of igno- nce. Such may well heed those awful ords of Jehovah, "Be ye not scoffers, st your bands be made strong," and ese most fearful words of Christ in e text.—The Preacher and Homiletic onthly.

Sunday Afternoon.

There are two or three hours on Sun- day afternoons which give to most of us a feeling of perfect leisure. How do we employ them? The attendance on morning church and Sunday-school is over, and before the evening bell shall ring, we have this space, this margin, which is an opportunity for repose, for reflection and for improvement, such as no other day affords.

Well, some of us go to bed. The Sun- day afternoon nap is taken by people who never think of lying down except on Sunday. We do not declaim against a daily nap. Every woman who can get it, is the better in health, and the fresher in feeling, and will last the longer in her usefulness and energy, if every day she will lie down for a half or a whole hour, and rest, and sleep if she can. But we do not approve of making a convenience of the Lord's day, and spending its golden time in slumber, simply because it is his day, and we can not sew.

Some people write letters on Sunday afternoon. There is a sort of corres- pondence which it is perfectly proper to en- gage in in holy time; but it is unneces- sary to say that it is correspondence suited to the day and to the spiritual tenor of thought and feeling which the day should induce. To save secular time by writing letters in sacred time, is a sin. To devote the pen to the ser- vice of business, of gossip, of compli- ment or of mirth is to defeat the object for which the hallowed day was given, and to lower the tone of one's religious character. It is not remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy, not observ- ing it by a holy resting all that day from employments appropriate to other days.

Some people read novels on Sunday afternoon. They may be sprinkled with piety as a cake is coated with sugar, or flavored with morality as a pudding is spiced with nutmeg. But they are nev- ertheless works of fiction, whose pri- mary purpose is to please the fancy, to amuse an idle hour, or to afford rec- reation to a jaded mind. For Sunday afternoon we entirely disapprove of them. Standard Christian classics are abundant. Biography presents a wide variety from which to choose, and no reading is more directly efficient in forming character than that of the lives of good men and women. Devotional poetry and missionary literature are elevating and profitable. Many of us could not do anything for ourselves quite so beneficial as to set apart our Sunday afternoon leisure for Bible read- ing and study. Few of us study our Bibles so deeply and so thoroughly as we ought.

The mother with her little ones, some of them too young as yet to comprehend distinctions of day from day, is quite- less the person who can least secure a season of unbroken rest on Sunday afternoon. But in the Christian family the children early learn that the more noisy play is prohibited on the Sabbath. They are willing, while yet very small, to have the little wagons and drums and whips and tops put in the closet till Monday; and, though the wee girlie may take care of her dolly as mamma does the baby, and the little boy run and jump out of doors, as the lambs frisk and the colt leaps, they soon catch the Sunday atmosphere; they like to see the Sunday picture books and to hear the Bible stories. Mother ought not to have the whole work of entertain- ing and teaching the children left to her. Father should share it, or aunty, or elder sister, and the duties of the day should be so adjusted that every one under the household should receive into the soul the blessing and the gladness of the day which is God's ever-benignant gift to man.

Forgiveness.

In the Middle Ages, when the lords and knights were always at war with each other, one of them resolved to re- venge himself on a neighbor who had offended him. It chanced that on the very evening when he had made this resolution, he heard that his enemy was to pass near his castle with only a very few men with him. It was a good op- portunity to take his revenge, and he determined not to let it pass. He spoke of his plan in the presence of his chap- lain, who tried in vain to persuade him to give it up. The good man said a great deal to the Duke about the sin of what he was going to do, but in vain: At length, seeing that all his words had no effect, he said, "My lord, since I can not persuade you to give up this plan of yours, you will at least come with me to the chapel, that we may pray to- gether before you go?" The Duke con- sented, and the chaplain and he knelt to- gether in prayer. Then the merci- loving Christian said to the revengeful warrior, "Will you repeat after me, sen- tence by sentence, the prayer which our Lord Jesus Christ himself taught to his disciples?"

"I will do it," replied the Duke.

He did it accordingly. The chaplain said a sentence, and the Duke repeated it, till he came to the petition, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." There the Duke was silent.

"My Lord Duke, you are silent," said the chaplain. "Will you be so good as to continue to repeat the words after me, 'as you do to the sea'." "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us."

"I cannot," replied the Duke.

"Well, God can not forgive you, for he has said so. He himself has given us this prayer. Therefore you must either give up your revenge or give up saying this prayer; for to ask God to pardon you as you pardon others, is to ask him to take vengeance on you for all your sins. Go now, my lord, and meet your victim. God will meet you at the great day of judgment."

The iron will of the Duke was broken. "No," said he, "I will finish my prayer. My God, my Father, pardon me; forgive me as I desire to forgive him who has offended me. 'Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil!'"

"Amen," said the chaplain.

"Amen," repeated the Duke, who now understood the Lord's Prayer better than he had ever done before, since he had learned to apply it to himself.—From "Preacher's Lantern."

THE SAILORS RELIGION.—At a meet- ing for prayer held in a mission house in London, one Sunday evening, a sailor rose to say a few words.

"My friends," said he, "I want to tell you what religion has done for me. It has made me love my mother, from whom I ran away when a boy; and it has made me provide for my wife and children, whom I had long neglected and treated unkindly."

Here you see how weak and sinful this man was before he had learned to love Jesus; but when he knew Him, and had eaten of the bread of life, it gave him strength to do what was right.—Richard Newton.

Religious Intelligence.

MISSIONARY.

The present ruler of Abyssinia, King John, is very like Philip the Second of Spain. Not only has he banished all the missionaries who have arrived at Massuwah after a long and very pain- ful journey; but under influence of the bishops and priests of the Church of Abyssinia, he caused diligent search to be made in the houses and huts of the people for copies of Bible distributed by the missionaries. Whenever a copy of the Scriptures was found, the luck- less owners were loaded with chains and cast into prison, and their home burn- ed down. "He persecutes the Jews," writes Theophilus Waldmeier, a mis- sionary; "he kills the Mohammedans; he causes destruction among the Gallas; and enforces the penalty of a death upon each one who does not agree with the unscrupulous, confused, and foolish ideas he inculcates into his ambitious mind by his fanatical and selfish clergy. The poor Abyssinians are suffering despar- ately under this tyrant." Mr. Wald- meier goes on to speak of mission work. "The Swedish missionaries," he says, "had a prosperous work on the eastern frontier of Abyssinia. The London Jew- ish Mission was working most success- fully among the Falashas or Abyssinian Jews, by native preachers, who were trained in Europe, and two stations in the northern part of the kingdom. Two German missionaries are engaged in Shoa, the southern part of Abyssinia, under King Menelek's dominion. Now it seems that all these messengers of peace cannot do anything, on account of the overwhelming warfare and blood- shed of King John, who is really like a tiger." Mr. Waldmeier speaks highly of Menelek, as also does Mr. John Mayor, a missionary in Shoa. One of the King's recent acts was the abolishing of the slave trade in his dominions; but more recent intelligence states that un- der pressure from King John, he issued a decree commanding all Moslems to be baptized and to become Christians. King John enforced the same stringent law in his own country, and punished all who would not consent to become Christians, of whom there were very few. He destroyed all their mosques, and built churches on the sites. Soon afterward King John summoned the Roman Catholic bishops and said to him: "I will allow no Catholic bishops. After the rainy season you must leave the country."—New York Independent.

Letters received by the Church Missionary Society from Kagei, central Africa, dated September 27, state that Mr. Mackay had not been able to cross the Lake Victoria Nyanza. He had received letters from Mr. Pearson, who is at Mtesa's capital, which show that the King, whose health is declining, is more capricious than ever. He has re- instituted his ancestral religion once more, and even placed Mohammedanism in conspicuous office, which the insignia of his Christianity, the hoisting of a flag on Sunday and the firing of a gun, have been discontinued. It is said that the changeful monarch was induced to be- come a Moslem by the influence of a dream, in which he beheld the moon surrounded by ten other moons. The central moon grew larger, and the other moons were subject to it. He also saw two angels, who ordered him to call on Allah. The French Catholic missiona- ries expressed themselves as indignant over the reports in the French papers that Mtesa has driven the Protestant missionaries out Uganda. They de- clared they had never made such a statement.

The Rev. Arthur P. Chaplin, a Wesleyan missionary in Natal, writing of an increase of eighty converts in Natal district, says this encouraging result is largely due to the energy and zeal of the native preachers. "I never," he testifies, "saw the equal of a good Zulu Christian any where for zeal in seeking the salvation of his own breth- ren. It is a passion with him that puts many of us to shame." Two old, and infirm couple, a husband and wife, by their persevering labors induced four- teen women to abandon heathenism and become Christians. The wife was blind, and could not herself go out and visit her neighbors; but she sent her husband telling him where to go and whom to address, and their mission was only know to themselves. Mr. Chaplin re- calls many such cases.

The Bombay Watchman reporting on the fifth session of the South India Conference, gives the present member- ship as 2,121, a gain in the past year of 105. There are 23 church buildings and 20 parsonages, an increase of 1 churches and 3 parsonages. The property is val- ued at $137,500, with a debt of $40,000. They have raised during the year for all purposes $62,663. They raised $1,- 200 for "transit fund." T. E. Morlow, W. A. Moore, Geo. Woodall, Wm. Brown, W. H. Stephens, W. H. Bruere were received on trial in the Conference. T. E. Oakes was re-transferred from America to this Conference and B. Peters was ordained. There are 30 ef- fective preachers in the conference, 3 are absent from ill-health. Of the 33 preachers, 17 are married. Of the gain in members, three-fifths are natives.

An Eastern paper notes that the missionaries in Alaska are disheartened by the evils of hoochinoo, or native whisky made from molasses, used by the Indians. The latter knows its harmful effects, but seem to have no power to withstand temptation. The Chiefs have begged the missionaries to go to Washington and prevent the traders from importing molasses. Be- fore going to some merry-making the people will bring their guns to the mis- sionaries to be kept till they are over their debauch.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

It is estimated that the number of mission schools at the present exceeds 12,000, and that the Bible has been translated into 226 languages and dia- lects, while its circulation during the past eighty years has reached an aggre- gate of 148,000,000 copies. Within the nine designated the annual contribu- tions for missions have increased from $2,500,000 to $8,000,000.

The Jesuit missionaries at Shanghai have lately printed two volumes of con- siderable interest, one of which con- tains a collection of imperial edicts and the rescripts of viceroys and other offi- cials in favor of Christianity, including also the treaties between France and China. The other volume is on the subject of the famous inscription at Si- ngan fu (discovered in 1625,) and con- tains the text of it, accompanied by critical remarks, etc.

Among the statistics of work accom- plished by foreign missions during the past century are these: Converts from heathenism, 1,500,000; languages into which the Bible has been translated, 226; copies of the Bible circulated, 148,- 000,000; barbarous languages endowed with grammar and literature, 70.

On a recent Sunday there were twenty-nine Chinamen present in the Bible-school of Trinity Baptist Church, New York, and in the evening of that day one of them was baptized.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—There is a suit in progress between the Orthodox and Progressive Friends in Indiana, which, according to an In- diana paper, involves the "possession and control of all the church property of the Society of Friends" in the State, as well as the use of some $2,500 or $3,000 left by will in 1808 to the Western Year- ly Meeting and the Western Quarterly Meeting. The contest is between Or- thodox and Progressive Friends. In- dependently of the questions of law in- volved, we are interested in the doc- trinal differences alleged in the papers before the court to exist between the defendants—the Orthodox Friends—and the plaintiffs, who are termed "Progressionists." The counsel of the plaintiffs gives a list of the "radical and material innovations" established by the Progressive branch, from which we summarize:

1. They deny that Christians should await the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit in conducting religious services; but claim that they should be governed by fixed purposes or a sense of duty in such matters.

2. They deny that men have an in- ward light, such as the light of Christ, till after conversion.

3. They teach that Christ had a human and a divine nature, and that the "divine nature or God-head" died on the cross.

4. They teach that the material bodies of the redeemed will be raised.

5. They teach that justification comes before sanctification in the case of a repentant sinner.

6. They hold that it is no longer necessary to continue the peculiar hab- its, dress, address, and forms of worship of the Friends.

7. They hold protracted meetings by prearrangement, and call publicly on persons to speak, or pray, or relate their Christian experience. The un- converted are asked to make confession of their sins, and they occupy seats set apart for the purpose. There is also singing.

8. Their Sabbath-schools are formally opened and closed, and vocal and in- strumental music is used.

9. Marriage is held to be a civil or- dinance and ministers may marry persons without reference to the inquiry or consent of society.

10. They hold that ministers should be regularly assigned to the ministry, and that money should be systematical- ly collected for their support.

11. They do not discourage the use of titles or addresses such as Miss, Mis- ter, etc.

12. At funerals they read from the scriptures, sing, and have a discourse from a special text.

All this is claimed to be different from what is held and practiced by the Orthodox Friends. The case is at pres- ent before a county court; but whatever decision is given will be appealed from, it is said, to the Supreme Court.—New York Independent.

An understanding has been come to between committees of the Northern and Southern Presbyterians in Texas in regard to the occupation of that field. The Southwestern Presbyterian says the Southern Presbyterians "have had this subject on their mind for some time, and some of them have felt more- or-less worried by the aggressiveness (perhaps we might say the successful) diplomacy of the Northern brethren. Their occupation of our church in Austin so long was a case in point. Those brethren are pushing on their work and other collisions have occurred. The Southern brethren seem to have decided to compromise the matter, by endorsing the work of the Northern Board and authorizing them to go ahead and occupy our field. They will cer- tainly avail themselves of the permis- sion."

The reprint of Purvey's revision of Wycliffe's translation of the New Tes- tament, issued by the Clarendon Press in 1879, has been so far acceptable to students that the delegates have decided upon issuing in a similar form a reprint of the poetical books of the old Testa- ment in the same version—viz.: Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. There will be, as before, a brief introduction by Prof. Skeat, and a full glossarial index, al- most entirely rewritten, compiled by Mr. Gabbett, of Lincoln College, Ox- ford, and carefully revised. Athe- næum.

The following religious sects, whose places of worship have been certified to the Registrar-General, England, for the first time this year, appeared in Whit- taker's Almanac for 1881: "Anglican Church," "Dependents," "New He- brew Congregation," "Open Brethren," "Salvation Army," "Primitive Church," and "Worshipers of God." The total number of religious sects now on the register is 180.

The Yearly Universalist Register for 1881 shows that since 1877 the num- ber of churches in that denomination has increased from 930 to 939, the mem- bership from 32,917 to 38,018, while the value of parish property has shrunk from $7,800,000 to $6,267,000. The Sun- day-school membership has fallen from 30,755 in 1878 to 28,151. The number of colleges and academies is reduced from fourteen to eleven.

In the revised New Testament, shortly to appear, the Lord's Prayer in Matthew is made to read thus: "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one." The doxology is omitted.

Germany is advancing steadily and quietly in Sunday-school matters. Great opposition has been overcome, and the work is now universally re- spected, and being pushed with in- creased energy. Mr. William Bauer, of Grison, who once strongly opposed the work, has just written a pamphlet urging the usefulness of the Sunday school upon all Prussian clergymen.

Vicar Apostolic Cosi, of Cham-Tong, has invented an alphabet of thirty-three letter, to take the place of the monosyl- labic Chinese words, and the Emperor of Austria has presented Mgr. Cosi with the necessary type to carry out his project, which, it is said, is becom- ing popular among the converts.

It is rehalmed in the Fortnightly Review that the natives of Madras have no real ethical principles, but only "customs," so that if it is the "custom" for one tribe or family to eat onions, and for another to steal horses, both are considered as equally right and justifi- able.

The Christian Intelligencer says that 143 of the Dutch Reformed Churches have lost ground during the last year, ten having lost 207 members, and thirty-one having gained, but one number.

Our Young People.

This Is ——.

BY CARRIE A. W. WHITE.

Little Miss Thistle lived in a basket,
But why she lived there, dear children—don't ask it!
The basket was pretty and cosey, but flowerless,
And little Miss Thistle was just a bit scornful.
She had nothing to do, and for naught did she care
But for getting pink feathers to put in her hair.
So many she wore at a time, 'twas no wonder
That no one could see her silly head under.

When little Miss Thistle grew older and wiser,
No longer she wanted the plumes to disguise her.
She pulled them all out, and let her head be dressed
Long, silked and fine, to the Zephyr's caresses.
But when she began to look clearly around,
Some very great faults in her basket she found.
She wished it was deeper, she wanted it wider.
And something about it exceedingly tried her.

Said little Miss Thistle, "I will not stay here,
The shabby old thing! I'll leave it this minute!"
Thereupon (oh) she sprang with the grace of a fairy,
Her form was so light, her raiment so airy.
But caught by the arms of the rollicking breeze,
She was borne in a trice to the tops of the trees,
Over hill, over dale, over woodland and meadow,
She swept with the wind, like a flitting cloud-shadow.

At length the gay breeze of his frolic grew weary,
And him exiled in the ground dark and dreary,
He dropped poor Miss Thistle.
She could not go on,
So there she is prisoned this moment, no doubt
Yet I think, by-and-by, when the withers is over,
And summer draws upward the green grass and clover,
With bright threads of sunshine and pale threads of gold,
Miss Thistle will work in her basket again.

—Youth's Companion.

"It Is In To Stay."

"Hurrah for Uncle Joseph!" shout- ed Edward; and Edward's brother and sister, Arthur and Annie, echoed the sentiment.

According to promise, Uncle Joseph had called to take his nephews and niece to see the pottery works, not far from the place in which they had all taken up summer quarters. Uncle Jos- eph at the hotel and his relatives at a comfortable cottage near by.

It was a fine bright day and not un- comfortably warm, so the walk of a mile and a half to the pottery was en- joyed by the whole party. So was the visit itself and the walk home, the lat- ter made lively by a discussion of the many interesting sights which had been witnessed.

The young folks had each brought away with them a souvenir of their visit in the shape of a very ordinary looking drinking-cup, decorated in blue and brown colors. These tokens they es- teemed not for their value in money, but because they had witnessed the manufacture of hundreds like them. They had seen between thirty and forty girls sitting before as many flat plates, which, by the aid of machinery, were kept spinning round at a very rapid rate. Again and again, as occasion required, a workman placed a small lump of clay upon each of these plates, when the operators, with deft fingers, would work them into shape and fashion out a cup. The form secured, the operator would dip a camel's hair brush into the blue or brown coloring matter as de- sired, and, with a light touch on the whirling vessel, make the rings upon its surface. Each ring was but the work of a second or so. The coloring finished, an attendant workman re- moved the cups from the fast-spinning wheels or plates; a further supply of clay was placed upon them, and the process was repeated.

The young visitors were exceedingly anxious to learn how the ware was hardened and glazed, and the proprie- tor of the place very cheerfully showed them the whole process. The soft cups were carried to an oven, which had been raised to a high temperature. Here they were baked with as much caution as a good cook pays to a Thanksgiving turkey or a batch of home-made bread, lest they should harden too speedily. From this oven the cups were removed to a second and hotter one; and from the second oven they were transferred to a third, which was still hotter. In the burning heat of this last oven they acquired the bright gloss, glaze so familiar to all of us on the surface of brown stoneware and pot- tery generally.

"There, sir," said the proprietor to Arthur, as he showed him one of the cups that had not yet had time to cool off after its fiery ordeal, "easily as that color was applied, neither you or I can by any means get it out. It is in to stay. You may break the vessel to pieces, but the color remains firm and fast."

The young folks examined many of the broken pieces of pottery and found that indeed the color was permanently burned in. They were assured that neither acid nor alkali would effect a change. There was no agency, however powerful that could do it.

Much interested, and not a little edi- fied, Uncle Joseph and his small party left the factory and started for home. The journey seemed far too short, so pleasant the conversation as each spoke of the object that had been to them the chief attraction.

They were almost home when Uncle Joseph said, "There is one thing, I think, I shall never forget in connection with our visit. I refer to the words of the proprietor, who made us so welcome. 'It is in to stay,' he said, and Annie, Edward, Arthur, I think our pleasant morning's trip may be of lasting use to us, if we remember those words and the lesson they suggest. It is almost as easy, I think, to color our character with a bad habit as it was to the opera- tors to color those cups. While you are young you will find that your im- pressions for good or bad are more than is the case with those who are older. You are now like the soft clay. Your after-life in the world, with its varied scenes, will prove like three furnaces, making permanent the coloring of youth. Many a young person who in youth has given way to some foolish and, indeed, sinful habit, with the idea that it could be quickly thrown aside, has in after years discovered that it was 'in to stay.'"

Rich both Ways.

One day I was sitting in a large meet- ing of people who had come together to promote a pious object. A father and his little girl sat near me. She was a bright-looking, curly-haired girl, about nine years old, and seemed much inter- ested in all about her.

"O father," I heard her say, "there's Carrie Morton!" and she looked in his face with an arch and knowing smile. "O, she's so good!" she continued; "she's rich both ways."

What could the child mean? I wished to know. Her father seemed also in doubt what kind of riches she had in mind as belonging to Carrie, and I lis- tened for the answer when he asked, "How is that, Katie? What do you mean by being 'rich both ways'?"

"Why, father, she has nice clothes, and her parents have plenty of money, and live in a large house, so she's rich [illegible]. An' the girls at school all love her, for she is always so gentle and kind; so she is rich another way."

Her father smiled, and so did I; but the proceedings of the meeting now be- gan, and the conversation ended.

I have among my dear young friends some who are poor, that is if their wealth were counted in money; others who are comfortably well off, as we say, having a good supply of the necessary things of this life; and others who are rich, whose fathers own costly houses, who can ride in a carriage when they will, and whose clothes are very fine. And, since I overheard Katie's talk about Carrie Morton, I have thought it would be well to remind all these dear children that although none of them may be "rich both ways," except those who have a great deal of money, yet they all may rich in one way. Can you tell how?

Did you ever hear of any one being rich in faith, hope and love? Carrie Morton was rich in kind words and acts, else her little friend would not have spoken of her as she did; and I hope she was also rich in the love of Jesus which makes the poor child richer than a king, if crown and kingdoms are his all.

Would you not rather be rich in the love of those who know you, and, most of all, the love of God, than rich in money, but poor in all the rest? Dear children, if God has given you a home where your every wish is gratified, re- member that at last you must give an account to him for such a home; and ask him to make you rich both ways, rich in the love of Jesus and in the hope of heaven. But, if you are not rich in clothes and money, remember that a meek and quiet spirit, and a loving, trusting heart, are ornaments more precious than diamonds and pearls; for, while the diamonds and pearls of this world must be left here at last to perish, these you shall wear in heaven. Re- member, that, with the grace of the Holy Spirit, you can become as a sun- beam, a source of joy in your home, wherever it may be; you can lay the treasures in that brighter home, where your heavenly father will keep them safely till he calls you to enjoy them with him for ever.—Children's Friend.

A Boy's Leisure Hours.

What a boy does with his leisure is most important; what he gets in school is mainly a drill of exercise; it is a gym- nasium to him; he must read elsewhere. What he does with his spare hours determines his destiny. Suppose he reads history every day, or scientific books; in the course of a few years he becomes learned. It matters little what he un- dertakes—Latin, Hebrew, Greek, San- scrit, all disappear if he uses his spare time on these.

A boy was employed in a lawyer's office, and had the daily paper to amuse himself with. He commenced to study French, and at that little desk became a fluent reader and writer of the French language. He accomplished this by laying aside the newspaper, and taking up something not so amusing but far more profitably.

A coachman was often obliged to wait long hours, while his mistress made calls. He determined to improve the time; he found a small volume con- taining the Eclogues of Virgil, but could not read it, and so purchased a Latin Grammar. Day by day he stud- ied this, and finally mastered all its in- tricacies. His mistress came behind him one day as he stood by the horses waiting for her, and asked what he was so intently reading. "Only a bit of Vir- gil, my lady." "What, do you read Latin?" "A little, my lady." She mentioned this to her husband, who in- sisted that David should have a teacher to instruct him. In a few years he be- came a learned man, and was a useful and loved minister in Scotland.

A boy was hired to open and shut the gates to let the teams, out of an iron mine. He sat on a log all day by the side of the gate. Sometimes an hour would pass before the teams came, and this he employed so well that there was scarcely any fact in history that escap- ed his attention. He began with a lit- tle book on English History that he found in the road; having learned that thoroughly, he borrowed of a minister Goldsmith's History of Greece. This good man became greatly interested in him and loaned him books, and was often seen sitting by him on the log, conversing with him about the people of ancient times.

All of these show that in this country any one can learn that wants to. If he is at work, he still has three hours he can call his own. Let him use those wisely, and he can fill his mind with stores of knowledge.—General Baptist Magazine.

EARLY IMPRESSIONS ARE.—Some years ago a native Greenlander came to the United States. It was too hot for him here, so he made up his mind to return home, and took passage on a ship that was going that way. But he died before he got back, and as he was dying he turned to those who were around him and said: "Go on deck and see if you can see ice." "What a strange thing," some would say. It was not a strange thing at all. When that man was a baby the first thing he saw, after his mother, was ice. His house was made of ice. The window was a slab of ice. He was cradled in ice. The water that he drank was melted ice. If he ever sat at a table it was a table of ice. The scenery about his house was ice. The mountains were ice. The fields were filled with ice. And when he becomes a man he had a sledge and twelve dogs that ran four fifty miles a day over ice. And many a day he stopped over a hole in the ice twenty four hours to put his spear in the head of any seal that might come there. He had always been ac- customed to see ice, and he knew that if his companions on the ship could see ice it would be evidence that he was near home. The thought of ice was the very last thought in his mind, as it was the very first impression made there.

The earliest impressions are the deepest. Those things which are in- stilled into the hearts of children pic- ture forever and forever.

THE GIRL AND PORTRAIT.—I remem- ber hearing of a girl who went into her master's room, a room not much fre- quented, to steal. Now there was a portrait in the room, and the eyes of the portrait seemed to follow her where- ever she went, and she felt annoyed by it; and in order that she might steal without this rebuke she took down the portrait and cut the eyes out. Poor, silly, wicked thing! If she could have plucked out God's eye she might have sinned without remorse. But so long as God's eye was upon her it was a vain thing that the eye of a portrait could follow her no more. If the eye of man were on you, it would keep you from indulging in sin. O, realize God's in- spection over you.—Wilson's "Scrip- ture Doctrine."

The Negro Increasing.

According to the recent census, the increase of the negro population, in the former slave States during the last ten years, has been at a much greater rate than during any previous decade. It appears that in these States, not including Texas, there were in 1880, 5,643,891, against 4,242,603, in 1870. This is an increase of rather more than thirty-three per cent. During the ten years from 1850 to 1860 the rate was about nineteen per cent. From 1840 to 1850, about twenty-five per cent. These statements are made by the New York Herald, and they may be correct. If the increase is a reliable indication of the greater physical comfort and general prosperity of a race, then it would follow that, in these respects, freedom has been highly conducive to the welfare of the negroes. But this test does not always hold good, as for example in New England and Ireland. But, admitting the conclusion to be a legitimate one, there are these further inferences, that the circumstances and treatment of the negroes in the South during the past ten years could not have been as terrible as our Northern outrage manufacturers have represented. How could the negroes have been so fearfully slaughtered, oppressed, and starved while they have increased at such an unprecedented rate? It would also appear that the negro exodus is of much smaller proportions than is usually supposed by those whose excited imaginations have pictured the whole race as fleeing from oppression to the open arms of their Northern sympathizers. If mere fecundity and increase are the tests of comfort and good treatment, the negroes are in better circumstances as to physical and material blessings, than the white people, either North or South, as their increase from births is greater than that of the whites in any section of the country.

However this may be, the fact that the negro population in the South is rapidly multiplying makes the future of the country, more and more, an unsolved problem. The races are not likely to amalgamate. If miscegenation were to become general, the result would be the utter degeneracy and enfeeblement of the nation. Inter-marriage, and intimate social relations, are never likely to prevail. The races will and ought to remain separate. The education of the negro will not materially affect this question. In spite of education and religion the distinctions of race and color will continue. That the two races may exist in peace under the same laws and political institutions is demonstrated as a present fact, and we wish it may always be so. But if the negroes continue to outgrow the whites, in the course of generations the preponderance may be such as to give trouble. Future generations, however, must manage their own affairs, and meet the difficulties, social and political, incident to their own times.

The negroes are a providential race, and doubtless have a mission of some sort, partly in connection with the destiny of the great American republic, and partly in relation to the world at large. The interpretation, however, cannot advance much beyond the development of historical events. It is clear to us that God has not intended that the world should become mulatto or quadroon, nor that the white race should surrender its domination of Christian civilization to the black. To educate, to Christianize, and by every means to elevate, are the duties of the present hour, and we heartily honor all who, in a spirit of benevolence, and in the love of God, are doing this work.

The negro is, on the whole, about the best laborer in the world. In the light of the late census there need be little apprehension that this labor will soon be exhausted. In the transition period, negro labor has somewhat deteriorated, but we believe there will be improvement as the race become more intelligent, and as they comprehend that industry and economy are necessary to their well being. They are here, and here to stay, and they are multiplying at an amazing rate. The best thing for them, and for the country, is to open to them every path of useful industry, and to see that they are generously and justly rewarded for their toil. If it were desirable, still it is impossible to get rid of the negro. We must accept the situation, and do what is possible towards making him a Christian man, and an intelligent and useful citizen. Besides the public school, the greatest need of the negro youth is the inculcation of habits of industry. Besides being taught to read and write, he is in urgent need of being taught to work.

Migration and Immigration.

MR. EDITOR: Bro. Featherstun's experience, as narrated in a recent number of the ADVOCATE, was highly interesting to me. He is evidently thoroughly converted as to his views of the relative merits of the East and the West. Before he left Mississippi our surroundings, political, social and of other kinds, seemed to him anything but propitious, and our prospects were to his eye of the gloomiest character, while California was the El Dorado of his thoughts, clothed with all the enchantments which distance lends to the view. But a year's residence in the West makes him wiser. He does not find a paradise there. Attraction thither has ceased, and turned the other way. Evidently more than half regretful of his own going, he sends back kindly words of counsel, well-calculated to settle into resolute content his friends who are still in Mississippi. All this is so natural, and so full of wholesome suggestion, that he will pardon me for stating a few thoughts awakened by reading his letter.

Discontent of some kind, and in some degree, is the normal state of our race. All the energies of mankind are sprung by discontent, and all improvements grow out of some sort of dissatisfaction with things as they are. In the kinds of discontent, and in the manners of manifesting it, there is the widest diversity. One of its most common and striking exhibitions is seen in the efforts of men to better their conditions by changing their places of abode. People, in every nation, State and community, imagine that it would be better for them to live in some other place. The dwellers in the city and the dwellers in the country have in all ages been mutual admirers of each other's surroundings. Yet all experience demonstrates that the thrift and general prosperity of a people depend not so much upon the qualities of the government, society or soil as upon the wisely-directed energies of individuals and communities. In every country some people do well; some would not do well in any. The difficulty seems to be in adapting ourselves to our circumstances, and this is usually easiest where the surroundings are not very diverse from those of our birth. Hundreds of young men have gone, since our late war especially, to California or Texas, or other distant places, expecting to find more favorable chances for making their fortunes. Some, no doubt, went wisely, and have succeeded well, but these would have succeeded anywhere. In many instances, however, their departure was unwise, ungallant, ungrateful and cowardly, as they left their mothers and sisters to wash and cook, and even labor in the field for a living, while they availed the ax and the plow at home to go in search of easy places elsewhere. But have they found them? Let the souls of those who were once wealthy in many parts of the South, now herding cattle in Texas at less than ten dollars a month, or the graduates of Harvard and Yale rolling wheelbarrows in the mines of Colorado, answer the question. Let the young men, born in homes of comfort, honor and wealth in the older States, now the companions of thieves and cutthroats, or the partners of outlaws and fugitives from justice, lurking among the mountains, or in penury of purse and bankruptcy of character, strolling the streets of some Western city, houseless and friendless vagabonds, living by chance, charity or pillage, in dangerous uncertainty between suicide and the gallows, answer the question. A son of an ex-Governor of one of the States in which the ADVOCATE chiefly circulates was recently found in the condition last described. It would be better to mend the old ship, or build a new one, and launch her in our native waters; we shall neither be safer nor happier on a foreign craft.

Another expression of our discontent takes the form of a desire for foreign immigration. Many cannot leave their homes. Yet they are not content. If they cannot go to others, others can come to them. More population is the cry. We want more people to build up our country, and better laborers for all manner of work. This species of dissatisfaction is, in most instances, not more reasonable than the last mentioned. In what instance have large additions of foreign populations been decidedly and permanently beneficial to the original inhabitants of a country? Let the expiring remains of the scores of Indian tribes that once occupied this continent furnish the answer. The illustration may be extreme, but is not inapt. No comers from abroad will do much for the country without first doing away with us.

There is a natural antipathy between unlike people, and the greater the degrees, and the more numerous the kinds of unlikeness, the greater and the more inseparable the antipathy. We naturally like those who are like us. Hence mixtures of very unlike people have never worked well socially, politically, religiously or economically.

Was not the separation of the Jews, of olden time, from all other nations an essential condition of the success of the Divine government among them? May we not affirm that, other things being equal, the more heterogeneous a people are the more difficult it is to Christianize them? There are cities in Mississippi a large part of whose population are practically as inaccessible to the gospel as if they lived in the heart of China. And why? Chiefly because of their unlikeness to the native inhabitants. The nation has been cursed with an excess of foreign immigration. Neither the State nor the church can assimilate the motley, throng constantly pressing to America from all nations. Their coming is, no doubt, a calamity. They will be for years as an irritating foreign substance in the body politic, and to the church will make society a mixed lump, which cannot be leavened.

No; it is not foreign immigrants we want, but we need the heroic determination, faithfully and wisely, to use our own energies to develop every resource of our country. When we have done our best we shall not have paradise regained; yet nothing less than this would satisfy the fancies of many. God has distributed advantages and disadvantages more equally over the world than we are apt to suppose.

Perhaps the best laborer for us in the world is the negro, as we have him, chiefly because we are accustomed to his ways, and he to ours. The Southern white man and the negro understand each other. No one in the place of either would suit the other so well. Let us then make the best of our situation, and if we never make our country what we would like to see it, we should live and die trying.

Since writing the above I have read the sigh of your Alabama correspondent for a flood of foreign emigrants. He need build no ark. That flood will not come; if for no other reason, because he and others wish it to come. If we had made our country more inviting than any other, we could not keep the immigrants away. No one wishes to get aboard a sinking ship. But should any unforeseen turn in the current of events bring that flood on then we shall be overwhelmed or swept away. When foreigners build up fortunes and a country here they will be theirs, not ours. We may rest assured of that.

Central Mexican Mission.

APPOINTMENTS, SCHOOLS, PREACHERS, ETC.

BY BISHOP KEENER.

CITY OF MEXICO, February 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Some eight years have passed since I first saw this capital of Mexico. Then I was the only American passenger on the train from Vera Cruz. Now we came up with passengers of two steamers from New Orleans, the "City of Merida" and the "Whitney," and one from New York. Besides the tourists, there were numbers of railroad men, who had come out to put through large American and Mexican contracts for roads to New Laredo, to El Paso and to the Pacific. We escaped the violent storm which set in at New Orleans two days after we had sailed, but in an hour after we had hailed at Vera Cruz the severest norther of the season began, and for three days cut off all communication between the shore and the shipping. We found the "City of Merida" to be a delightful vessel in all its appointments. Her officers, steward and waiters, the table and general comfort of the vessel, were all that a passenger could desire. The ascent of the Cordilleras was, if possible, more entrancing to the eye than ever before. We saw the sun rise in great majesty. We were well up in the neighborhood of the Boca del Monte. Far beneath us were the smaller ranges of mountains in rolling succession, and about us the larger were standing in manifest awe. Varied tints of purple and deep green gave individuality to their domes and peaks. The valleys were black with gloom and depth, and lay distributed in long, irregular inlets of the ebbing night. A high metallic cone was the last screen of the coming orb. The earth gave one surge, and, in an instant, his full disc of fire stood out upon its course. Just before the break of day our eyes had been refreshed with the Southern Cross. In this latitude it wheels above the horizon for a little while, yet long enough to leave its splendor upon the mind for the rest of one's life.

After a very dusty day's ride over the plain, we arrived in the city about nine o'clock at night. The brethren were awaiting us, and we received such a greeting as Spanish brethren can alone give. They had gathered at the Mission House, some fifteen or twenty of them. The situation of our Mission House is admirable, in front of the Alemada, and by the great public drive of the city, within four doors of the United States Legation. Our mission family consists of Dr. and Sister Patterson, Bro. and Sister MacDonell, Miss Charlotte Hallaran, Bessie, Anne and little Guillermo, a paradise in Mexico. Here Dr. Wilson and I have found a delightful home during our stay, and from this center we radiate to San Augustine, Ayotla, Toluca and Anieca. The upper part of the house is occupied by the family, the lower is the office, the seminary room and the printing establishment.

Bro. Patterson has charge of the English congregation, formerly held by Dr. Butler. There we have preached several times, as also at San Andres, to our Spanish congregation. On the last Sabbath afternoon six of the Spanish preachers were ordained to the office of deacon, and two were recognized in orders as elders, one from the Episcopal and one from the Presbyterian Church.

Deacons.—Eusebio Dias Herrera, Pastro Espinoza, Margarito H. Cuevas, Tranquilino U. Santin, Roman Medina, Aunda Ruis Herrera.

Recognized as Elders.—Francis Aguilar, from the Presbyterian Church; Geronimo Neyra, from the Episcopal Church.

We have held some five sessions of the Central Mexican Mission, Dr. Wilson attending, and have ascertained the statistical condition of the work, which we give in the subjoined items. It must be recollected that our mission was, for the two years immediately previous to Bro. Patterson's appointment without a superintendent, or even the presence of an American. We had then one church at San Andres, two native preachers, a boys' and a girls' school, and some few reliable members. Now we have the following:

In all, there is preaching at seventy-two places, many of which are the county towns of very populous districts; several of them are large cities.

The whole number of members in good standing is 591. The congregations range from 30 to 200 persons. At communion service nearly all who attend church are ready to commune.

SCHOOLS.

There are 33 Sabbath-schools, with 725 scholars, and 26 free day-schools. Nineteen of these employ special teachers, and at other places the pastor is the teacher.

At every appointment we either own a house or rent one for church service, and usually one for school purposes.

THE BIBLE SEMINARY FOR YOUNG PREACHERS.

There are six young men at present studying in the seminary under the superintendent, and being taught grammar, rhetoric, theology and music—Antonio Sanchez, Refugio Morales, Domingo Romero, Rosindo Valle, Henrico Adam and Esteban Martinez. Connected with this is a boarding hall, where the students room. Besides these, every Monday and Tuesday the preachers within reach of the city recite to the superintendent in theology and Discipline.

THE PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT.

We have an excellent press and font, and office fixtures, where we publish the Evangelista, catechisms, circulars, tracts, and other printed matter, constantly wanted for the mission. A first-rate translator and printer, and two boys, are employed, the former, Mr. Basano, from Texas.

ORGANS IN CHURCHES.

Nine organs have been supplied to different congregations. A few days ago some thirteen brethren came in for an organ from Jacozingo, one hundred miles distant, and they carried one home on their backs, rejoicing in the treasure. The principal man made us a neat speech on the occasion; said that he had only gratitude to pay in return for it, and then gave me three warm Spanish embraces. Could any orthodox dissenter or precenter hear the hearty way in which Mexican congregations drown the organ, I am quite sure he would be reconciled to this Methodist innovation. It proves a great help in teaching our tunes to this people.

Among the agreeable incidents of our visit has been a reception given us by Sister Patterson the first week after our arrival, to which were invited all the members of the several Protestant missions in the city. Some of our native preachers played the piano, and sang with much taste. The American ladies also present enlivened the hour with songs and tunes that called up the memories of dear and distant homes.

No better work is being done in the Republic of Mexico than that by our mission in the Federal State, the States of Hidalgo, Guanajuata, Oaxaca, Michoacan, Mexico, Morelas, Vera Cruz, and Colima. In many places it requires a courage of high order to stand against the fanaticism of a system yet fierce in its dying throes. One of our preachers was with Stevens at Ahuatlco, in the hour of his martyrdom, and only escaped by favor of the deep shadow of a garden; two others were in prison at San Augustine for several months, by the wilful ruling of a magistrate, and others have been assailed and arrested during service.

Other missions are doing a fine work, and the brethren who represent them are in excellent spirits. All realize now that it was by the providence of God the Protestant Church so long preceded the commercial enterprise which has of late turned its attention to this promising field. The Bible Societies and the Tract Societies, too, both of America and England, have been steadily at work leavening the mass, and preparing the way for the preaching of the word.

Some might conclude that these various agencies are competitive, and in each other's way; but wherever the Spirit of the Lord is there is harmony. Each church has a distinct financial backing at home, and in such an undertaking all strength is needed that can be had. Of late several important rules have been agreed upon, by Conference of the missionaries, for mutual benefit in prosecuting their work: 1. The rule of occupation. That any place first occupied by a mission shall be left exclusively to that mission, provided the number of its inhabitants be under 25,000; if over, it is open to all. 2. Occupation shall imply a preparation for and the maintenance of regular services. 3. If regular service shall be discontinued for twelve months the occupation ceases. 4. The rules of occupation shall not extend over whole States, but apply to single towns or cities. These are important regulations, and will doubtless conserve the good feeling which exists among the laborers, and so will advance the cultivation of this rich field of the Spirit. In the cities of Mexico and Orizaba and Leon the two Methodisms meet. These places have large populations, too large to be well occupied by one church.

When one is present in a mission field the mind looks for help alone to the dispensation of the Spirit; that is, to the original sources of power. Mere theory, however evangelical, stands dumb and helpless before the work which is to be done. The persuasive force of man upon his fellows is felt to be insufficient to change the spirit of man as fortified by the prejudice and superstition of countries. Only the power displayed in the jail at Philippi can evoke the enquiry: "What shall I do to be saved?" or change a hard nature at the point to die into a grateful and believing disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. And is not this the prime effect of missionary work upon the churches at home—a deeper, broader, nearer view of the dispensation of the Spirit, as a dispensation of power, of love, and of a renewed mind?

How is Rome standing all this? Well, Rome in Mexico is in a bad way. The political side of the Mexican reformation is well-nigh completed. There are several hundred silvery bells in many towers in the city, but all are mute. There yet remain traces of the large religious houses which overshadowed the very liberties of the worshiper, but they are now rudely invaded, or are being carted away for building material. The hooded nun has disappeared. To be seen in priestly garb is to be liable to a fine of $200. Bro. MacDonell wore in the streets for awhile a straight cut Georgia-breasted Methodist coat, which fitted him snugly; but one of our Mexican preachers got the printed law on clerical vestments, which took the buckram quite out of the coat, and retired it for repairs. Lately the Jesuits have been creeping back, one by one, but the thunder is in the air, and the Mexican law is again fulminating against this most pernicious sect of ecclesiastical detectives. We happened to be in the Cathedral at a morning's mass. It was a sad display. The priest had on his surplice, but the acolyte had on only a short jeans coat. Not a word was uttered by the ministrant, only motions and kneelings, and at every kneeling the acolyte rang a small hand-bell, that's all. No organ, no chant, no incense; all plain, dry, perfunctory. I shall never forget that short-coat mass and the dumb priest. It was a literal "going through the motions" of a service threatened with forgetfulness.

On our way to Vera Cruz we shall stop at Orizaba to ordain the pastor, Severiano Gallegas, a deacon. At the Mission the little children have become quite adept at the trill of the R., and talk the language as if born to it. Bro. and Sister Patterson talk it readily. Miss Hallaran teaches it to a school of over thirty children. The rest of us are content to eat Spanish. I am glad to see that Bro. Patterson has recovered the shape of his nose, and the only remains of the blow of the highwayman are an old straw hat with a bullet hole, and powder smut through its rim, close to the crown, which will well fit a for a peg in our future Mission Museum. Dr. Wilson is in good health, and I am better than when I left home.

Mississippi Notes.

We have indications of a temperance revival in the State, and throughout the South. In Mississippi, the secular papers are discussing the question, but most generally with a strong leaning toward whisky. Prohibition and local-option are ridiculed as impracticable folly, and their advocates as fools and fanatics. Still convictions are deepening and a grand forward movement seems inevitable. The miserable "Pint Law" passed by the Legislature of 1880 is bearing its painful fruit. Its leprosy is spreading over the country. The late grand jury of Alcorn county in their final report to the court uttered these significant words:

"We would further report that we find crimes on the increase, as we believe, caused to a great extent by the operation of the Pint Liquor Law, and we would earnestly recommend its repeal; and we recommend a constitutional amendment forbidding the importation and sale of spirits except for medical use." That voices a growing sentiment. Already aggressive work has commenced. Mass meetings have been held in several counties. At Magnolia, Rev. J. W. Shadell has championed the irrepressible conflict with rare skill and gratifying success. The Baptist Record published at Jackson, is advocating prohibition with zeal and marked ability. Editor Gambrell wields a vigorous pen and writes with the courage of profound conviction. The initial number of a new temperance paper, entitled the Prohibitionist, published by Rev. S. A. Steel of Columbus, will make its appearance by the time this reaches your readers. So the hosts of God are marshaling. May Heaven speed their conquests.

The "Central Christian Advocate," to be issued in Memphis, and edited by Rev. W. S. Harrison, and by Rev. D. D. Moore, inventors of the North Mississippi Conference is the latest announcement. The Rev. Mr. Moore is at present editor of the Grenada New South which publication will continue under his management. The Rev. W. S. Harrison has been stationed at Water Valley, Columbus, Macon and other prominent places, is a graceful writer and has had some newspaper experience. What will be their success in a field so well supplied by the Western Methodist, and Nashville and New Orleans Advocates, the future will determine. To multiply church papers and thereby distribute patronage by long division is rather a dangerous policy. It causes each to live at a poor, dying rate. But when good is accomplished for the Master we can but wish each a prosperous career.

The proceedings of the third annual session of the State Sunday school Convention have been published in pamphlet form. The statistical report though incomplete is full of suggestions. One fact is specially noticeable, the large number of Union Schools in the State. Leake county reports nine schools, two Methodist and seven union. Attala county is the banner, reporting forty schools, distributed denominationally as follows: Fifteen Methodist, fourteen Union, seven Baptist, three Lutheran, and one Presbyterian. Hinds county, though the largest in population only reports twenty-five. The pamphlet contains a lengthy address to the people on the observance of the Sabbath, with a synopsis of the laws of Mississippi relating thereto. Sixteen delegates were elected to the International Sunday-school Convention which meets at Toronto on the twenty-eighth of June next, of this number I notice the names of Dr. H. E. Johnson and Rev. E. H. Mounger of the Mississippi Conference. The next State Convention will be held at Jackson, on Wednesday, June 1. It would be well for our pastors to attend these conventions. A comparison of methods and our exchange and interchange of views will doubtless be helpful to each and all.

DAVID FINN.

The last Brandon Republican gives editorially a history of this rather remarkable old sinner. He is now eighty-one years old and has been a criminal from boyhood. As an example of utter depravity, without shame or conscience, I extract the following:

He was born in the wild mountainous region of Kentucky, and raised in that and the "moonshiner" districts of Tennessee. To defraud the government was, therefore, at an early age, one of his boasted accomplishments, and he also became one of the first liquor drinkers in those parts. On the day of the great battle of New Orleans, he was fifteen years of age, and that is now his invariable rule for telling how old he is. Mr. Finn has been three times a bridegroom—having first been married in Kentucky, next in Chickasaw county, Miss., near Houston, and the third time in the northern part of Rankin. By his last wife he has six small children, the eldest being 12 and the youngest only one year old, all dependent upon their eighty-two-year old father for support, and he in Brandon, under guard, with clear proof of his guilt as a counterfeiter staring him in the face. The old man speaks freely upon any subject, and says he's in a tight place now. Just after the war he got first near Aberdeen, having roved around over the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri and Arkansas, disposing of his ill gotten gains. Here he brought his dies and went to work, and soon had gold mixed with pewter made into tens, fives and twenties, and circulating all over that country, until he was found out and carried before the United States Court at Oxford. Turning States evidence, he was instrumental in sending a few honest men to the penitentiary, or at least in bringing them before the public. He was turned loose and went back to Aberdeen, but finding he could not get along in that section very well, he moved to Rankin county, the first northern portion of which he has lived for thirteen years, enjoying the reputation of a good, peaceable, quiet citizen, until last year, when he was again caught up with by a detective from Mobile. Before the United States Court at Jackson, he again turned States evidence, before Judge Hill, clearing himself and implicating many others. He plead guilty, of course, and turned over to the State his dies and over $15 00 in his money. He tells us, that in his life he has made at least fifty pair of dies and turned out more than a wagon load of money, but says he's quit now. We guess he has, or rather will when our Circuit Court draws off his account.

The newspapers are discussing pro and con the establishment of a female college or university by the State. Something will be said on the subject at another time. C. H. O.

Notes from Nashville.

MR. EDITOR: We had an interesting service yesterday afternoon at Vanderbilt. The Rev. J. J. Ransom, our missionary to Brazil, delivered an excellent discourse. It was full of light and electric power. He was rather severe on his Tennessee brethren, who lag behind in missionary matters; but they are coming up. Vanderbilt will furnish a corps of missionaries. In new Wesley Hall will be a mission room, with a repository for books, papers, curiosities, etc., a missionary museum. We are ready now for the reception of anything in that line. We mean business. Bro. Ransom was introduced by Bro. Sawrie, the presiding elder, who, with Bros. Browne and Keagan (pastors,) took part in the exercises, which were enlivened by good missionary melodies, led by the organ and choir. Bro. Ransom expects to attend missionary meetings in Richmond, Sunday, March 6. He then proposes to attend the Baltimore Conference, at Harrisonburg, Va., March 9, and then to proceed to his Brazilian home. He is to be accompanied by two missionaries and their wives, and an excellent lady from Louisville, who goes to Brazil as a teacher, under the auspices of the Woman's Missionary Society. Thus you see the process of crystallization has been going silently on, and we shall have "a cause" (as our English cousins call it) in that great Empire.

Last week was a stirring week among us. First came the commencement of the Medical Department of Vanderbilt University, when a large number of graduates received diplomas. Next came Washington's birthday, with its celebration, sacred to the Literary Societies. The representative of the Dialectic Society, Mr. Butt, of North Carolina, delivered himself on the College Boy, and a more witty, humorous and satirical urchin we never had on our boards. Mr. Lyons, who was to represent the Philosophic Society, was sick, so the Rev. Dr. Price, who presided, told us what he might have said if he had been present, and such an outlaw of American history—that was the theme—we never before heard. Why, it streamed out as from an ocean-fount; then it was so clear and sweet—a "liquid lapse of murmuring stream." It was wonderful. By the way, Dr. Price is doing well in the Nashville Female Academy. He has just imported one of our Alabama ladies as a teacher, an accomplished daughter of our friend, Hemphill, of Tuskaloosa, a valuable acquisition. The doctor must seek larger premises, and he has his eye upon such as will meet all his wants. He has a capital institution.

The reception given by Mrs. Judge East to her son, Mr. Augustus Ward, and his lovely bride, on Washington's birthday, was the most recherche affair I have witnessed for many a day. I cannot describe it, so I will not attempt. I saw no beverage there stronger than good old Java coffee. I blessed the bridal pair from my heart. Mr. Ward has been one of my favorites from his boyhood. Like his stepfather, he is a lawyer, and bids fair to follow him closely in his noble profession. He brought his beautiful bride—nee Miss Toof from Memphis. Heaven's blessings attend them!

On Wednesday night we had the commencement of the Pharmaceutical and Dental Departments of Vanderbilt University. The chancellor presided. Bishop McTyeire offered one of his characteristically appropriate prayers, and the usual exercises proceeded pleasantly, enlivened by stirring music, and closed with the usual promenade, which the young folks relish. These departments are going forward prosperously. I was surprised to hear from Dean Morgan's report what a vast amount of work was done during the session in the infirmary of the Dental Department. The relief thus afforded to poor sufferers, while the students are thereby advanced in their studies, was immense. This is an interesting feature of that department. Diplomas were awarded to quite a number in each school. The faculties are accomplished men in their respective professions, and they are very enthusiastic.

Some have remarked on the late celebrations omitting, including, that of the societies; that the speaking was not in the highest style of oratory. Perhaps not; but it was sensible and ad rem. The professors engaged to teach students how to doctor the teeth, how to compound drugs, how to "exhibit" them, and they well fulfilled their engagement. They make doctors of medicine, pharmacy and dentistry; they leave others to turn out orators!

We have a fine class in the Biblical Department; several of the students are preparing for the mission work. We are still receiving letters of information concerning this department, and we are glad to furnish registers, etc., to all applicants. But we suggest that it is not advisable that any should matriculate at this late period in the session. Let all who wish to come get their licenses and recommendations, and make their appearance at new Wesley Hall, September 1.

But I must stop. God bless you.

THOS. O. SUMMERS.

NASHVILLE, February 28, 1881.

Thai Missionary Resolution.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in the ADVOCATE of March 3 a note from Bro. Urquhart, concerning the resolution adopted at the last session of the Alabama Conference, pledging the members to pay a certain per cent. of their salaries to the missionary cause. He informs us that the vote was not unanimous. I merely take occasion to state that the above-mentioned resolution was published as a matter of information, it having been adopted at a missionary meeting, and was not official action on the part of the Conference.

I was not at the missionary meeting, and cannot speak authoritatively as Bro. Urquhart seems to do. I understood that the resolution met with no opposition or dissent, that nobody voted against it, hence it was claimed, and, it seems to me, justly, that it was binding on all who were present. "Silence gives consent," and it would not look well to repudiate now. I speak on the supposition that opportunity was given for discussion or a negative vote. Whether it will bind those of us who were absent, and without voice in the transaction, remains to be seen; but as for Bro. Urquhart, if he was present, it rather looks like he is in for it.

R. B. CRAWFORD.

Rev. J. J. Lovett, writing from Spring Cottage, Miss., under date of February 21, 1881, says: "My work lies on the east bank of Pearl river, from near Columbia to near Gainesville, which is mostly a pine forest, although there are some very fertile lands on the river. The people are generally engaged in logging and stock raising in connection with their farms, which is very profitable when they have success. But the stock are dying more this winter than they have ever been known to before in the country. It is supposed that the loss will be as much as the increase for ten years. The spiritual state of the church is deplorable—no class meetings, no prayer meetings, and a very few who hold family worship. But the indications are good for improvement. The people are as kind and hospitable as I ever knew. The assessments are all made, and everything is moving on harmoniously. The destroying angel passed through our community, and one of our most prominent citizens, Mr. Harrison Ford, fell a victim to the spoiler of our race, on the sixteenth of this month. He left a family of young children. May the Lord take them under his fatherly watch care, and give them his sustaining grace."

Rev. George Fontaine, writing from Yellow Bluff, Ala., says: "Our community was suddenly shocked February 14, by the very unexpected and sudden death of Sister Lillie S. Bright (nee Gollhold) wife of Mr. Augustus C. Bright, formerly of Mobile. The very deepest gloom and sadness pervade the entire community. She leaves beside husband, mother, brothers and sisters a darling little infant girl six weeks old."

Rev. O. S. Perry, writing from Fort Deposit, Ala., March 2, says: "The weather and mud have been unusually bad, and thus far I have done very little on my work. The outlook is favorable, and we are working and praying for a genuine revival."

We regret to learn, though a letter from her grand-daughter, Miss Sara Young, that Mrs. Ann A. Hurst, the beloved mother of Mrs. A. E. Young, died in Selma, Ala., February 25. Her last hours were full of comfort and assurance, and her trust in Christ unshaken. Sister Hurst was forty-seven years a resident of New Orleans, having but recently, with her daughter and grand-children, removed to Selma. Venerable in years and ripe for the Heavenly Kingdom, she has fallen asleep in Jesus. We esteemed Sister Hurst very highly. We tender our sympathy to the bereaved family.

—We notice that Prof. J. B. Elliott, M. D., of the University of Louisiana, lectures on this, Thursday, night March 10, at 8 o'clock, at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association in this city, on "What is Evolution?" The lecture will, doubtless, be well worth hearing, and we hope there will be a large audience. We are gratified to know that our friend and brother, Rev. D. L. Mitchel, General Secretary, is laboring assiduously, and that the Association is doing a noble work in New Orleans. All good citizens should give it a helping hand.

Rev. Dr. Harmon, in charge of the Delhi and Madison circuit, Louisiana Conference, has been spending a few days in this city. He reports his work as full of promise, and as developing finely, considering the severe weather and the mud. The Doctor has an important field, and difficult. May the Master's blessings rest under his labors.

We have received a copy of the Thirty-First Annual Report of the Southwestern Bible Society. The pamphlet contains the able address of Dr. B. M. Palmer, on God's Providence Toward the Bible. Copies of the report and address can be obtained at the Bible House in this city, 163 Camp street. Price, ten cents.

Rev. W. B. Murrah, and Miss Beulah Fitzhugh, daughter of Prof. Fitzhugh of the University of Mississippi, were married at the residence of the bride's father, Oxford, Miss., by Dr. J. J. Wheat, February 17. We congratulate our friends, and pray that heaven's benediction may rest upon them.

We are under obligations to Rev. J. S. Oakley, Assistant Secretary, for a copy of the minutes of the recent session of the North Mississippi Conference. The pamphlet is brought out in good style, and the editing appears to be done with accuracy and judgment.

We are indebted to Rev. O. A. Darby for a copy of the minutes of the last session of the South Carolina Conference. The statistical reports are particularly full and complete, giving the items concerning each appointment in the several circuits.

—Rev. S. H. Werlein was ordained elder on the night of March 2, at the Louisiana Avenue Church, by Bishop Keener.

Dr. Somerville, the Scotch Evangelist, is holding meetings in Germany, and they are attracting large audiences.

Arkansas and New Orleans.

The Fort Smith Elevator, of February 25, says:

On this day the last spike is driven in the railroad from Little Rock to Arkansas City, Ark., a point at which the largest vessels may load with full cargo, and at which lately, one vessel took on 8000 bales of cotton. It gives us close connection with the greatest metropolitan city in the South—New Orleans—and with which a great and constantly increasing trade from the whole of Arkansas, and the Arkansas Valley in particular, will and must of necessity arise. New Orleans is our natural outlet, our natural mart, and, thanks to the great genius of Eads, it will now always be so.

The L. R. & F. S., and the L. R. & A. C. R. R., being owned and operated by managers, some of whom have a common interest in, each will make it a through line, with one set of freights and charges, and consequently a cheaper and better one for the people. Now, where will our cotton go, and where will we buy our heavy groceries? New Orleans will be the place, and all the combinations of Gould cannot prevent it.

We have just learned that the right of way for the road from Arkansas City, Kansas, through the Indian country, to Fort Smith, has been given by the House of Representatives at Washington, and it is expected the Senate will also agree to it. Then will the Arkansas City of the North, shake hands with Arkansas City of the South; and then as much grain will go down this great Valley to New Orleans to ship to the world, as now goes down the Mississippi from St. Louis.

The Sixty-fourth Annual Report of the American Colonization Society refers to Judge McGehee, as follows:

Hon. Edward McGehee, of Mississippi, elected a Vice President in 1833, died at Woodville, October 1, aged nearly ninety-four years. Of high christian character, he had taken an enlightened interest in philanthropic and religious enterprizes, and especially by his benefactions and his impressive advocacy, he had contributed to the success of this Society. It has been said of Judge McGehee by one who knew him well, that "his name was the synonym of integrity and honor, and throughout an exceptionally long and active life it was unsullied."

—The Rev. Dr. Punshon, we are glad to hear, says the London Watchman of February 16, has somewhat recovered from the attack of illness with which he was seized a few days ago at Walsall. He is now staying with Mr. Jesse Hosse, near Hull, and, acting upon medical advice, will rest for a month or two.

Nicholism is a new complaint making the churches. It is the next thing to Nihilism: that is, it comes within a nickel of putting nothing into the contribution box. This disease is not confined to religious tramps and repairers, but attacks well-to-do pew holders, who thus keep up appearance at the smallest cost. The widow's mite, it is well to remember, was recommended, only because it was all she had.

The late Hugh Mehaffy, who died recently at Paxton, Ill., and who is said to have given, during his lifetime, for purposes of charity, $50,000, left a will in which were contained the following bequests: To the Central Tennessee College, $10,000; to the parent Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, $10,000; to the American Bible Society, $10,000.

If our memory deceives us not, we remember a very important passage in the writings of Carlyle in which he speaks of it being a pitiable sign in a nation when the young men are Conservative. If our students are not for progress, and freedom, and righteousness, the prospect of our country is poor indeed.

Periodicals.

We are obliged to Rev. Dr. Haygood for a copy of his sermon on The New South preached on Thanksgiving day Nov. 25, 1880. We believe that nearly the whole people of the South are in substantial agreement with the views expressed by the author in this sermon. For one, we believe that slavery was right, that it fulfilled a great providential mission, and we are thankful that the country is rid of it. In our desire for a new South, however, we would retain what was good of the old, and guard against making the new South a mere southern New England. For it be a new South, and not the old North built upon the ashes of the old South.

The Southern Pulpit, March, 1881, has, among its sermons, one by Dr. A. A. Lipscomb on "Things Not Written and Things Written," one by Rev. Thomas Atkinson, D. D., LL. D., late Bishop of North Carolina, and one by Rev. C. H. Read, D. D., pastor of Grace Street Presbyterian Church, Richmond, Va. Dr. A. W. Wilson contributes a sermon sketch, and there are sketches by several other distinguished preachers. The Southern Pulpit is published and conducted by Rev. H. M. Jackson and Rev. J. Lafferty, Richmond, Va. It is published monthly at $1 50 per annum.

—The Popular Science Monthly for March has: Physical Education; The Problem of Municipal Nuisances; A Piece of Coal, illustrated; The Development of Political Institutions, by Herbert Spencer; The Legal Position of Married Women; The State as an Educator; The Morals of Luxury; Mind as a Measure of Nature, and other articles.

—The Fortnightly Review, February, 1881, has: Tennyson and Musset, by A. C. Swinburn; Political Differentiation, by Herbert Spencer; Leonce Delavergne, by T. E. C. Leslie; Small Farmers in Southwestern France; The People Commodians, by George Meredith. Also, The Freres, by Mrs. Alexander, and other articles.

The late Emperor Nicholas happened one day to be engaged in inspecting a state penitentiary, in one of the provincial seats of government, and took it into his head to question some of the convicts respecting the nature of the offences for which they were suffering punishment. "Who are you here for?" he asked of one. "I am innocent, Imperial Majesty," replied the prisoner, falling upon his knees. "A victim of false witness. A church was robbed, a bottle knocked on the head. The peasant caught, laid it on me, and I knew nothing about it." Similar replies were given by the other prisoners. The Emperor, strongly bored by these successive protestations of guiltlessness, cast a glance along the line of prisoners, until his eye fell upon a ragged, wretched looking object, whom he beckoned forward, with the words: "Of course, you, too, are here on a false charge." "Not a bit of it, your Majesty," replied the ragamuffin. "It was all fair and square as far as I am concerned. I stole a coat from a tradesman." "Stole a person like you!" said the Czar, with a laugh, and then, addressing the governor of the prison, with well-assumed sternness, "I am thoroughly for nothing as a fastidious man of honor. I cannot allow him to remain a minute longer in such honorable and virtuous company lest he pervert all these good, honest people."

"Good woman," said a man out in a country road, "can you see a man on a bicycle just before you?" "No; I don't see any kind of sickle, mister, but just as I said a wagon wheel running away with a man. You can believe it or no. I wouldn't if I hadn't seen it myself."

FIVE FAMOUS OPERAS.

MIGNON. (27) By AMBROISE THOMAS. This very successful opera first became known in Paris, where it slowly but surely worked its way to permanent favor, and has become one of the standards. It is very full, occupies 95 pages, and furnishes to the purchaser quite a library of music of a high order.

AIDA. (28) Grand opera by VERDI. Composed for the first time for the ruler of Egypt, and first given in that ancient kingdom. Wherever the scene of the story is laid, the strange life of old Egypt is appropriately found to afford a splendid field by the thrilling magic of one of the most brilliant of composers.

CARMEN. (29) By GEORGES BIZET. A Spanish opera, introducing a good deal of Gipsies, Soldiers, Spanish Dance, a Toreador and Spanish Costumes and Manners. We are in contact with the Gipsies, watch and mingle in the Spanish Bull-fights, and the music is quite in consonance with the prevailing sentiments.

MEFISTOFELE. (30) By A. BOITO. Mefistofele is the true devil, as represented in the Faust legend, followed through all. A daring composition, sometimes startling, at times weird and grand, and pronounced a success.

FATINITZA. (31) By F. VON SUPPE, whose name is a household word wherever operas are known. A rollicking, droll story of Russians and Turks during the war. Very popular.

OBTAINING NEW POTATOES. Gerald Howatt, writing on Irish potatoes, in the Country Gentleman, says more efforts should be made to secure new and suitable varieties, than are generally being made by the American potato grower. Very few indeed are the varieties now grown that approach anything near to perfection. A table potato fine in flavor may be a poor grower, or not of good appearance; and for market this is very essential, as looks invariably sell potatoes. To combine these qualities in one either early or late should be our aim. White skin and flesh always take the market. To attain these points, we must cross varieties by placing the pollen of the one on the stigma of the other variety, selecting perfectly healthy plants. Cut off the whole truss of flowers and shake it over the middle of the other; the middle of the day being best, as all must be perfectly dry as you would pepper ever meat. After the seed balls are as large as pin heads, remove all but three or four of the centre ones in the truss, those being the strongest. The outside ones can be removed with a pair of scissors. After dusting with pollen, cover with a gauze or old veil, to prevent the pollen being wafted by the wind. Be careful when selecting your ripe seed balls; save none that are not perfect in shape. If your operation has taken, the difference in size of seed-ball is easily seen in comparing with the others; if no difference, you cannot with certainty depend on them. Grow all one season, and in digging select your most promising, not of size, shapes and colors. The following year, make a closer selection from them, and mark habit of growth. By being familiar with the general run of potatoes, you will soon designate the best. Patience is the great requisite. By sticking to it you will get what you want. With patience, we can breed animals to almost any desired color or quality, as you will order a pair of shoes.

Hybridizing one species with a different species, requires more care and a good conception of the different species. In all hybridizing put the stronger on the weak, for the reason the flow of sap is so much stronger in a strong plant than a weak one, the weaker retaining the stronger quicker. Through forgetting this, a very great many failures result.—Mobile Register.

HOGS ON THE FARM. The Southern Farmer says every year the importance of raising our own pork becomes more apparent on this coast. Our farmers find that there is a policy as well as profit in raising pork upon the farm. Alfalfa fields make the best kind of hog pastures at any season of the year. Grain fields are easily harvested by hogs, and the stubble fields are gleaned by them. On many farms, particularly where dairying and grain growing are carried on together, the cost of raising a few hogs each year is nothing, as they get their living upon what would otherwise go to waste. But it pays to feed hogs well; to keep them in good growing order from their birth till they are ready for the butcher. The hog should be looked upon as a necessary part of every good farmer's stock. And while he saves what would otherwise go to waste, he should also be provided for in times when there is no feed. A few sections of movable fence will allow any grain grower to pasture hogs upon the growing crop in sections, as convenience may suggest. In this way the expense of keeping where open pasturage is not obtainable, will be greatly lessened. No good farmer can afford to neglect the matter of providing pasturage in this or in some other economical manner. While hogs in the great pork-producing States are dying off with the hog cholera, ours are remarkably free from all diseases. We can produce healthy and better pork on the Southern coast, than in any other section of the United States. Farmers who feel the effect of hard times should think upon this subject, and by taking advantage of every means of profit turn their attention to branches of farming that will pay and not neglect so profitable a resource as the growing and fattening of hogs to supply the home demand.

SMALL THINGS IN THE GARDEN. In the family garden, says the Savannah News, the fault of forgetting to provide a supply of vegetables is not apt to prevail, but rather some minor products are often wanted just when they cannot conveniently be obtained. Much of the value of a garden consists in the many little things which it affords; things which in themselves can hardly be considered food, but which render other food more palatable, or add to the attractiveness of the table. Few who are fond of pickles and relishes will fail to provide for cucumbers, lettuce, peppers, nasturtiums and similar vegetables. The ones more generally neglected are parsley, majoran, summer savory, thyme, sage, mints, fennel, drill, coriander, caraway, etc. All these are of the easiest culture, and may be grown from seeds, most of them giving returns the same season where ordinary garden culture is given. Celery is another product which is seldom found in the farmer's garden. Few would like to go without it after having enjoyed it for a single season, especially as its culture is not difficult. The most difficult part is its preservation during winter. It may be kept for a few weeks in the cellar. The seeds may be sown, and the plants transplanted at about the same time as cabbage, in rows four feet apart, and six inches apart in the row. The soil must be enriched in the drill, and the plants not allowed to want for water at any time during growth.—Mobile Register.

THOROUGH-BRED POULTRY.—Thorough breeding in the poultry yard pays quite as well as among larger animals, though very little attention is paid to it. Most farmers are satisfied with breeding turkeys from the runts of the flock, which generally means birds hatched in August or September, which have not had time to mature for the Thanksgiving and Christmas markets. Toms weighing fifteen pounds, and hens ten pounds, will indeed perpetuate the race, but there is very little profit in breeding such stock, when birds, a third or more heavier, are within their reach, and can be bred with no more care or cost. The introduction of a thorough-bred Bronze or Narragansett gobbler, weighing twenty pounds or more, at eight months from the shell, among a flock of mongrel turkey hens, will add from three to five pounds weight per head to the turkeys raised the first season. The cost of such a young cock is not far from $5. Suppose a hundred birds to be raised, the gain would be about four hundred pounds, which, at the price last Rhode Island turkeys brought the past season in Eastern markets, twenty cents a pound, would be $80. As turkeys with a good range get their own living through the summer, the most of this is clear gain. It will pay those who raise turkeys to invest in thorough-bred gobblers.—American Agriculturist.

PARSNIPS.—Parsnips make a very fine growth in most portions of the Northern States, as their leaves afford considerable shade, while their roots extend a few distance into the ground. In fact the roots are entirely covered, and are so long that they will reach moisture if it is within a reasonable reach of the surface of the ground. The yield of the crop is very large, and the labor required to cultivate it is not very great. The roots afford desirable food to most kinds of animals, especially to milch cows. They are sweet, and on this account they are relished by young cattle. They are, however, difficult to keep. They contain so much water that they freeze easily. Exposed to the sun and wind they become almost as dry as hay. Freezing does not injure them. In fact, it improves their taste by converting part of the starch into sugar. But parsnips that have been frozen decay very readily, or send out sprouts that absorb the substance of the roots. But with all these objections parsnips afford excellent stock food late in the spring.

EGG PRODUCTION. Usually care and food have more influence than the breed. From fifty to one hundred and fifty eggs per annum can be taken as the ordinary limit. The non-sitters would probably exceed others by from ten to thirty eggs per annum. The Poultry World states as a fact, a year or two ago, that a yield of twelve dozen per annum is seldom reached, even with non-sitters having the best of care. A statement went the rounds of the papers some time ago, placing the highest average of Asiatics at one hundred and thirty eggs, and of the French, Leghorn and Hamburg fowls, at not over one hundred and forty. With all breeds, exceptional cases are reported of much greater yields, but in the yards of the average farmer and poultry raiser, the highest figures named will seldom be reached. No one getting a yield of less than one hundred eggs per annum ever makes a report to the public, and very few reports are made.—Country Gentleman.

WHENCE THEY COME FROM.—Naturalists assert that cabbages grew wild in Siberia; celery originated in Germany; the potato is a native of Peru; the onion originated in Egypt; tobacco was a native of South America; millet was first discovered in India; the nettle is a native of Europe; the citron is a native of Asia; oats originated in North Africa; rye came from Siberia; parsley was discovered in Sardinia; the parsnip is a native of Arabia; the sunflower was brought from Peru; spinach was first cultivated in Arabia; the horse-chestnut is a native of Thibet; the quince came from the island of Crete; the pear is supposed to be of Egyptian origin; the horse radish came from the south of Europe.

A considerable number of flowers, some of them conspicuous for beauty, produce an injurious and even fatal effect upon bees and other winged insects. Among such flowers are the dahlia, the passion-flower, the crown imperial and the oleander. The honey of the latter is said to be fatal to flies. The showy flowers of the kalmia latifolia, or American Mountain Laurel, may also be included among those which prove deadly to the bee which visits them for their nectar. The honey made from some of these flowers, such as the Rhododendron punctatum and Andromeda, is poisonous to man as well as to the bees.

As a general thing sheep in winter quarters are too much crowded, and thus when a portion of the flock are lying down, the rest being obliged to stand, frequently trample on their fellows through restlessness and fright. Give access to water twice a day if possible. Warm, roomy quarters in winter and plenty of water are important elements of success in sheep raising.

In regard to English experiments the claim is, that by the constant grazing with cattle and the accumulation of nitrogen and potash in the soil through the medium of cotton cake, a pasture containing all the best species of grasses and an abundant growth of white clover has been produced.

A new seedling currant, grown by Lincoln Fay, of Brocton, N. Y., and called Fay's currant, is attracting the attention of fruit-growers on account of its productiveness and fine appearance. In the quality and size of the berries it resembles the churry currant, while in length of bunch it compares favorably with the "Victoria."

About two years ago pine straw or leaves became an article of trade in the Wilmington, N. C., market, and The South says it is now impossible to supply the demand. "Shipped North it undergoes certain preparations, and is then used for stuffing mattresses and for other purposes."

SULPHUR FOR RUPT.—Rupt will sometimes yield to the following treatment: Open the affected fowl's beak and with a tube, which may be formed of paper, blow half a teaspoonful of sulphur down the throat. Three applications have been known to cure.

The Massachusetts Plowman says: "Last year our agricultural societies awarded for trotting horses $7,725.15, and for objects not strictly agricultural $10,393.27, while for experiments on manure the trifle of $267 only was offered."

A few rubbing-posts set up in pastures will save injury to the fences. Cattle will use these conveniences very often; and it is worth all the trouble, says an agricultural writer, to witness the enjoyment of the animals in the use of them.

All feeders who have studied the habits of the animals they feed, have discerned that they take special note of time, and are disappointed if the time is delayed only a few minutes.

No farmer in the older States can afford to sell wood ashes for any price that the soap boiler would pay. Where oats lodge, as they are apt to do upon heavily manured land, an application of ashes would save the crop.

To prevent young apple trees from being destroyed by mice during this season of the year, the snow should be trodden down firmly about the roots and bodies of the trees to the distance of two or three feet from the trunk.

A resident of Berlin, N. J., gathered this season from 31-100 acre of Kirkwood strawberries without extra culture 311 quarts of fruit, that sold for $211.51, gross.

The Lycoming tannery at Williamsport, Pa., annually manipulates 26,000 hides, and uses in the process of tanning 12,000 tons of bark.

BOILED TURKEY.—Wash the turkey in tepid water and rub it all over with lemon juice; then put it into a saucepanful of boiling water, with a large piece of butter, a couple of onions, a head of celery, some sliced carrots, a bunch of parsley and sweet herbs, whole pepper, mace, cloves, and salt to taste. Let it boil slowly and remove carefully any scum that may rise. Serve with celery sauce, made as follows: Boil two or three heads of celery in salted water, with a bunch of sweet herbs and some whole pepper, and salt to taste; when thoroughly done, pass them through a hair sieve. Melt a piece of butter in a saucepan, mix a tablespoonful of flour with it, then add the celery pulp, stir and dilute to the proper consistency with milk or cream, or it may be served with oyster sauce. Parboil the oysters in their own liquor, beard them and reserve all the liquor. Melt a piece of butter in a saucepan, add a little flour, the oyster liquor and enough milk to make as much sauce as is wanted. Put in a blade of mace and a bay leaf tied together, pepper and salt to taste, and the least dust of cayenne. Let the sauce come to the boil, add the oysters and as soon as they are quite hot remove the mace and bay leaf. Stir in a few drops of lemon juice, and serve. There should be plenty of oysters, and they may be cut into four pieces after being parboiled.—New York Herald.

THE BEST RICE PUDDING.—This rice pudding is the best ever made in spite of the fact that it is the cheapest. The secret of its perfection is the long cooking it gets. For a six o'clock dinner the rice and milk should be put on early in the forenoon. The best thing to cook it in is a double kettle. Let it simmer on the back of the stove—it must never boil until a couple of hours before dinner. It will then be a thick, creamy substance. Then salt and sweeten it to taste, put it into a pudding dish, and bake it in a moderate oven until it is of a jelly like thickness, and the top is slightly browned. It can be eaten either hot or cold. If the latter is preferred, the pudding may be made the day before, if that is most convenient. If desired a flavoring may be added. This is emphatically the perfect pudding of its kind.—Western Rural.

SAND BAG FOR THE SICK-ROOM.—One of the most convenient articles to be used in a sick-room is a sand bag. Get some clean, fine sand, dry it thoroughly in a kettle on the stove; make a bag about eight inches square of flannel, fill it with the dry sand, sew the opening carefully together, and cover the bag with cotton or linen cloth. This will prevent the sand from sifting out, and will also enable you to heat the bag quickly by placing it in the oven, or even on top of the stove. After once using this you will never again attempt to warm the feet or hands of a sick person with a bottle of hot water or a brick. The sand holds the heat a long time; and the bag can be tucked up to the back without hurting the invalid. It is a good plan to make two or three of the bags and keep them ready for use.

CHOCOLATE CREAM DROPS.—Take two cupfuls of white sugar, half-cupful of milk; put them into a saucepan and beat until it boils; then boil hard five minutes precisely. Set the pan in a dish of cold water; stir until the mixture creams and cools enough to handle; then mould into small drops, laying them on a buttered platter. Flavor if you prefer. Take half a cake of Baker's chocolate, scrape fine; put into a bowl and set in the top of a steaming (not boiling) tea-kettle till dissolved; then take the creams, one at a time, and drop into the chocolate, roll over quickly, take out with a fork and slip on a buttered platter. Be careful not to let the chocolate cook, or it will harden.

CREAM CAKE.—One-half cup of butter, one-half cup of sugar, two eggs, one cup of milk, three cups of flour, two spoonfuls powder. Filling for cake: One pint of milk, two spoonfuls cornstarch, one-half cup sugar and half a teaspoonful vanilla; dissolve until smooth—the cornstarch in a little of the cold milk. Put into a double boiler the remainder of the milk, the sugar and the vanilla; add, lastly, the dissolved cornstarch and stir altogether constantly for about two minutes; it will then be at the proper consistency; spread while hot on the layers of cake.

TO MEND CRACKED STOVES.—Cracks in stoves may be mended as follows: Mix equal parts wood ashes and salt into a paste with water and fill in the cracks; it will soon get hard and close the crack with what is known as a rust joint. For cast-iron that is not heated, a cement is made of fine fillings of cast-iron wetted with a solution of sal ammoniac and made into a paste with flower of sulphur.—Western Rural.

BUTTERMILK CHEESE.—You can make delicious little cheeses by warming up buttermilk until it quite curdles, then straining it through a bag, mixing the curd with a little cream, butter and salt, then pressing it into a small basin or cup for a few hours. It is very nice for breakfast or lunch. The last scones, teacakes and plain cake are made with buttermilk instead of sweet milk or water, using a small quantity of carbonate of soda.

ARROWROOT PUDDING.—Take a quart of rich milk, and in that put three and one-half teaspoonfuls of arrowroot; to this add a green peach-leaf or two grated bitter almonds; boil until smooth, stirring constantly; take off the fire and allow to cool; when cool add the yolks and whites of four eggs, which have been beaten up thoroughly; sweeten to taste, one-quarter of a pound of sugar is sufficient; grate lemon-peel, and add a little of the juice; bake for an hour, and eat cold.—Cultivator.

COSMETICS FOR THE COMPLEXION.—Mix glycerine with water, equal parts; add a small quantity of cologne or any other perfume. Apply to the face upon retiring at night. This preparation will impart a soft white skin and it is said to remove all discolorations and roughness of skin, also smooths out the marks from small-pox.

CRULLERS.—Two cups flour; one of sugar; one-half cup of butter; two eggs; vanilla or cinnamon. Mix with milk or water as soft as possible. Sift two teaspoons of Soda-foam with flour. Fry in hot lard, but not too hot.

CURRANT PUDDING.—One-fourth pound beef-suet chopped fine; three cups flour; one pound currants; three apples pared and chopped; mix with water. Roll out the crust and spread it over with the currants and apples. Put it in a bag and boil one and one-half hours.

LADY CAKE.—Two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, one cup of milk, one-half cup of cornstarch, two cups of flour, whites of eight eggs, three teaspoonfuls baking powder. Flavor with bitter almond.

SAUCE FOR CURRANT PUDDING.—White of one egg beaten to a froth; one tablespoon of melted butter beaten up with the egg; one-half cup of white sugar. Essence of vanilla or lemon.

AMERICAN SCHOOLS.—President Eliot, of Harvard writes the statement that "there are scattered over the United States about three hundred and sixty colleges or universities, exclusive of institutions which receive only women. Of these nearly two hundred have been organized since 1850; only twenty were in existence before this century, and only twenty-eight were in existence in 1820." It will be observed that all but twenty-eight of our colleges have been founded within sixty years, and more than two hundred of them within thirty years. All of our theological seminaries have been established during this century. Andover, the oldest, was founded in 1807; Princeton, in 1812; Hamilton, 1820; Rochester Theological Seminary, 1852; Chicago Baptist Seminary, 1867.

Those facts are very significant. They show, in the first place, how widespread and universal is the interest in this country in Christian colleges. They indicate, too, the rapid increase of facilities for higher education. But, perhaps, the most significant thing about these facts is the hope for the future suggested by them. All those two hundred founded since 1850 may be said to be in their infancy. Thirty years is not a long time in the life of a college. Usually in the first thirty years a college only gets fairly started in its great work. It takes time to lay foundations, construct buildings, accumulate funds, acquire reputation and to create a large active alumni.

The past thirty years have not been highly favorable to the growth of colleges. Twenty years of that time have been largely engrossed with the civil war and its immediate disastrous consequences. Yet these thirty years have been years of rapid development of the West. Population has poured in by millions, new states and territories have been organized, thousands of miles of railroad have been built, and the community has gradually assumed something of fixedness and order. Wealth has been accumulated, men have gained leisure, a desire for education has been created, and a growing interest in all forms of higher culture has been fostered.

We think that in view of all these facts we may confidently look forward to a steady, healthy, if not rapid development of our college system all over the country. We have entered upon a period of unusual prosperity. Men are accumulating wealth which will largely seek employment in benevolent channels. Our colleges, universities and seminaries have shown their vitality and usefulness. We may hope to see during the next ten years at furthest the realization of some of those hopes which have been to some of us, though long deferred, yet ever a source of inspiration and courage. Indeed, we hope fervently that the work of endowing and enlarging our institutions may receive no check, and that we may be able to chronicle a steady growth all along the line.—Standard.

Carlyle at Home.

Americans were always going to see Carlyle, and were commonly rewarded for their curiosity and admiration by being told in his bluff, gruff way that their country was bent devilward, and that it merited its doom. Many of them will remember his plain house in Cheyne Row, Chelsea, and the plain drawing-room in which he commonly sat, consoling himself with his clay pipes; surrounded by portraits of Hume, Frederick, Goethe, Martin Luther, Cromwell, and several of himself, one, it must be confessed, among his most honored heroes. A singularly strong, striking head and face were his, more so in reality than in any counterfeit presentment. The nose was shapely, resolute, aggressive, the eye lambent and passionate, ever changing, now tender, now stern, now hopeful, now despairing, but always gleaming as with a challenge to fate; the chin long, prominent, firm as adamant; the hair rather coarse, abundant, disordered, half-falling, half-bristling, over an overhanging brow; the mouth large, well-formed, nervous, shutting like a vise; the whole expression of the face supremely sad, pitiably despondent, though so hardy and defiant that no one dare pity it or him, and revealing to insight that the illuminating soul within it had itself sounded that all had come hoping altogether such in picture and in original was Thomas Carlyle, the Tory of British literature, the great iconoclast of the nineteenth century.

Up to a very short time before his death he used to take early morning walks; his tall, tent, heavy-set figure, neatly but plainly clad; his clothes fitting to a T, and crowned by a firm shovel-black felt hat, he and the moral courage to use it invariably a silk cylinder even in London, drawing the eyes of persons wherever he passed, as the negro ascetic of a desert lay ground him. He walked, when in good condition, two or three miles through the noisome, grimy streets, sometimes wrapped in deep thought, sometimes seeing surroundings; sometimes observing everything, gazing into the shop windows, and glancing everywhere, but the most part alone, he was fond of the company of one of his intimates, and in such company he usually kept up a steady flow of peculiar, pictorial talk, the counterpart of his printed sentences, showing that his style often called affected, had grown to be his natural form of expression. He had a fastidious fondness for calling a spade by the longest circumlocution he could invent, and he unfrequently went below Temple Bar, alternately communing with himself and talking in the cockney dialect and panorama of the city.

Carlyle's hours of composition were generally three to four from 9 or 10 A. M. to 2 P. M., unless he was specially engaged at home, when he added an hour or two to the ordinary dinner. He wrote unevenly at times slowly, then rapidly, but always with care, never allowing his manuscript to go from him until it suited him exactly. He frequently destroyed whole pages upon which he had labored hard and long, being extremely fastidious as to punctuation as well as to words and arrangement. But the writing of his books was much less than his preparation for writing, which was immensely thorough and conscientious. No man had a keener appetite for work, and yet he worked far faster than most authors. His reading was stupendous, and he did it with surprising quickness, despatching a volume of ordinary size while many persons would be engaged with a few chapters. For hour after hours of his life he reckon an average from six to eight hours a day, sitting up for this purpose generally until four o'clock in the morning.

It is said that having gone to spend an afternoon and dine with a new acquaintance, an Arriving several hours before his host, he entered the library, upon which the gentleman prided himself, as it contained a number of rare and curious volumes. The host arrived and dinner was eaten. After leaving the table, he told the author that he should be happy to show him his books. "I've read 'em," was the laconic answering and it proved that Carlyle had actually absorbed in the time before dinner all that was available to him in the well-chosen library.

When Charles Dickens had decided to write "A Tale of Two Cities," knowing that Carlyle had made special studies for his "French Revolution," he asked the latter to send him a few books that would be best worth consulting. Judge of the novelist's surprise when a large van drove up to his door and discharged its load of volumes, native or six languages, to his amazement and dismay. That was Carlyle's notion of a few books "really enough for a moderate library."

A characteristic anecdote is told of the Scotch image-breaker. A shipowner, a fellow countryman, went from Glasgow to call on him, and entering his presence said with fervor and feeling, "I have come to see you, Mr. Carlyle, to tell you that I admire and honor you; that I have built a ship and named it after you on account of the good you have done in the world." Then quoth the author, with his marked accent, "I don't believe you, mann! I never did any guide in the warld! Nabody ever did a ay guide in the warld! There is na guide in the warld!"

William Black, the novelist, once called on Carlyle, and after a little conversation, the philosopher remarked, "You know Scotland very well, I see. I've read your novels with pleesure. They're very amusing, vary. But what are ye goin' to do some work when are ye goin' to write some real books mmm?"—Boston Traveller.

Archæology and Industry of the Sahara.

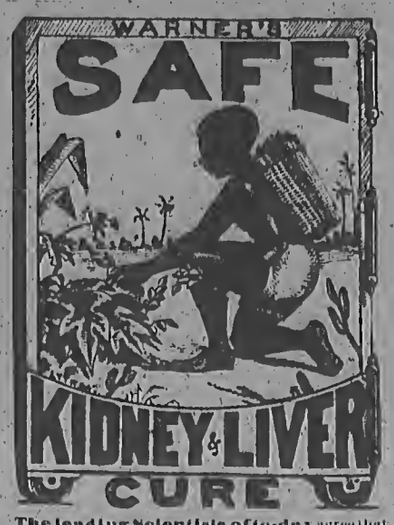
M. Rabourdin, who accompanied Col. Flatters in his expedition in connection with the Trans Saharan Railway, for the purpose chiefly of archeological research, gave an account of some of the results at a recent meeting of the French Society of Political Economy. He discovered numerous deposits of chipped flints. At Wargla he was shown some beautiful arrow heads; and over a distance of about 500 miles he met with eighteen flint works, the presence of flattrees and cores, proving that they had been wrought on the spot. Consequently, M. Rabourdin infers that in prehistoric times the desert was inhabitable, and peopled most densely in its northern and southern parts. He also met with remains of those great-horned oxen which Herodotus tell us were found in the country of the Garamantes. M. Rabourdin also collected some interesting economical facts. The camel is the life of the Sahara, he thinks, was formerly much more active than it is now. True, the principal element of this commerce was the slave-trade. Since Christians have endeavored to put down this trade; the caravans take the Tripoli and Tunis routes; even yet the traffic is carried on chiefly on French territory. M. Rabourdin states that the Arabs treat their slaves kindly, and generally end by giving them their liberty. The Wed-Rir is peopled by these freed negroes, who are excellent cultivators, laborers and industrians, and knowing thoroughly how to irrigate their lands. He considers these negroes much superior to the lazy, gluttonous, and degraded Arabs. The industry of the Soudan is comparatively advanced; all the objects, arms, harness, utensils of various sorts which the Touaregs possess come from that country, whence also they obtain powder, ivory, gold-dust, and even, it is said, emeralds. The Touaregs do not buy these articles; they take them under the form of tribute from the caravans which traverse their country. M. Rabourdin stated that the construction of the Trans-Saharan Railway would meet with no physical difficulties; the dunes are solidified, the simoon is perfectly harmless, the ground is uniform; the curves, the slopes, and the engineering works would be of the most trifling kind. The Soudan, M. Rabourdin stated, would offer for traffic resources which are not to be despised. Already the English have created outlets for it. A Touareg told him that English traders reached Timbuctoo by the Niger, in iron boats, which could be placed on wheels, and thus avoid the rapids. The market of Timbuctoo is abundantly furnished with the most varied products. "You will find there," the Touareg said, "everything except your father and mother." M. Rabourdin does not anticipate that the progress of the steam engine would meet with any interruption from the tribute-levying Touaregs who would find it difficult to treat a railway train as they do a caravan of camels.—London Watchman.

Household Customs in Japan.

When a woman reaches her house, she takes off her sandals, pushes aside the sliding doors of paper and rushes in her stocking feet. The rooms are softly matted, but contain no furniture. The houses are built of wood, and among the poorer classes live but two or three rooms. In the kitchen is a large stove fox with ashes and burning coals in it. This is called the hibachi, and over it there is a crook. There is no chimney in the kitchen, but the smoke goes out either through the front open door or through an opening in the roof. After the rice is cooked, it is put into a small, lacquered wooden tub. A Japanese eats the rice with chopsticks. Fish, soup, potatoes and a pickle are sometimes served with a dinner. Japanese houses often have but one sleeping-room, which is occupied by the entire family. When guests come they sleep in it with them. The hotels consist of heavy comforters. They are spread out on the mats at night, and put away in the closets during the day. Each person has his head on a little wooden pillow, constructed with a hollow place in which the head rests. In some room in the house is a closet containing a shelf for gods, and upon this shelf stands all the household idols, which have come down as heirlooms in the family from generation to generation.—Helping Hand.

Prohibition.

The question of prohibition to protect society from evils which are the legitimate progeny of the liquor traffic is not confined to a single State, but is arousing the attention of thoughtful men not only in the United States but in Europe. The best legal minds of England have rendered it careful thought. Sir Matthew Hale, in his day, gave it as his opinion that four-fifths of all the crimes committed in England were the result of excessive drinking. In Ireland, a number of years ago, there was a temperance movement under Father Matthew which caused the consumption of liquor to fall off in one year from 12,236,000 gallons to 5,290,000. During this time crimes of a certain character were reduced from 13,000 to 179 the year the temperance movement was put in operation. In the Bridewell, in Dublin, the prisoners were reduced that same year from 130 to 23, and one hundred cells, which previously were crowded, were, during this period, wholly unoccupied. The temperance sentiment unhappily did not crystalize into a law, and Ireland has again sunk down into its former state of drunkenness and crime. There is not a competent criminal lawyer nor a capable judge in the State of Texas who will hazard his reputation by denying the assertion often made in the Advocate that four-fifths of the crime in our State, and four-fifths of the criminal prosecutions in our courts, with their consequent bill of charges to be met by the tax-payers, are traceable, directly or indirectly, to the sale and use of intoxicating liquors. This cause of crime demands the attention of our legislators.



The use of liquor is one of the chief causes of disease in the land. It destroys more lives each year than the yellow fever, against which national, State and municipal quarantines are legally instituted. Dr. Hitchcock, president of the Michigan Board of Health, recently declared that the use of alcoholic stimulants has given to the nation 300,000 idiots, and that it furnishes a very large per centage of the insane men and women who occupy the different asylums of the land. The statistics secured by the different life insurance companies have caused them to class the use of intoxicating liquors with consumption and cholera and other fatal diseases, and hence they refuse to take risks on the lives of men who are habitual liquor drinkers.

Many of the Southern States are waking up to the necessity of clearing the land of this curse. Kansas has adopted prohibition. South Carolina, Georgia and other States are moving in the same direction. Texas is being aroused respecting the importance of this movement. Our present Legislature is urging its members a larger number of temperate men than any preceding session. If our people demand prohibition, the question may at once be submitted to the people. Let every moral and law abiding man define his position in this issue. Let the names of men and women go up to Austin on memorials and petitions demanding that the moral sentiment of the people shall be formulated into law, which will test the question whether the land must longer be burdened by this curse.

The Viceroy of India (Lord Ripon, Roman Catholic) has arrested the movement of the ecclesiastical department of the State to the Hon. James Hilds, a member of the Government of India, who is an English Churchman.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S —MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages.—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing information has been proven by long use to be of value, more than is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

"The Doctors Said

I would never leave my bed. That was three weeks ago, and now I weigh 180 pounds. I cannot write half of what I want to say, but Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure did it all."

H. C. ROUSE, Rahway, N. J.

Nearly all the ills that afflict Mankind can be prevented and cured by keeping the stomach, liver and kidneys in perfect working order. There is no medicine known that will do this as quickly and surely, without interfering with your duties as Parker's Ginger Tonic. See advertisement.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 1.—Fourteen national banks deposited in the treasury to-day legal tenders amounting to $1,063,000 to retire their circulation. The deposits made for this purpose up to date aggregate $17,132,979.

BROWNSVILLE, Texas, March 3.—The Texas Mexican Telegraph Company's cable was completed to Vera Cruz yesterday. A final test will be made Monday.

CHICAGO, March 3.—Another very severe snowstorm is prevailing throughout the entire Northwest. At this point it is the severest experienced this winter; the wind is very high, and the snow drifts heavily as it falls. In Wisconsin, Iowa and Illinois, where the railroads have not recovered from the storm of Saturday and Sunday, it is feared the present snow will interdict travel for a week.

CHICAGO, March 4.—It is still snowing this morning, and the indications are that the great storm which began Wednesday evening has not finished yet, while its results, in suspending traffic, will survive nearly a week. In the country around Chicago all traces of roads have entirely disappeared. In the Chicago Post Office over two hundred tons of mail matter have accumulated, waiting to be sent out.

MISSISSIPPI CITY, Miss., March 5.—One of the buildings of the Military Institute at Pass Christian, burned to the ground to-day at ten o'clock. Sparks from the burning woods set the house on fire. The furniture was saved. Loss three thousand dollars. No insurance.

PASCAGOULA, Miss., March 5.—The difficulty heretofore reported at Ocean Springs between Father Ahern, a Catholic priest, and C. F. Emery, a lawyer, ended yesterday for the time being in the arrest of Rev. Father Ahern at Ocean Springs and his incarceration in the county jail at this place, last night, for contempt of court.

The priest was accompanied to the place by his sister, Miss Kate Ahern, who insisted on going with her brother into the jail. When being led inside by the sheriff and told she could not enter, she cried out she had been struck, when Father Ahern struck Sheriff Clark on the head with a walking stick inflicting a rather painful though not serious wound.

The priest has been committed to jail for five days. Considerable excitement is manifested over the affair.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4.—President Garfield this afternoon sent to the senate the following nominations: James G. Blaine, of Maine, to be secretary of State; Wm. Windom, of Minnesota, secretary of the treasury; Wayne MacVeagh, of Pennsylvania, attorney general; Thomas L. James, of New York, postmaster general; Samuel J. Kirkwood, of Iowa, secretary of the interior; Robert T. Lincoln, of Illinois, secretary of war; Wm. H. Hunt, of Louisiana, secretary of the navy. The senate received these nominations at 3:05 and immediately, on motion of Mr. Cameron, of Pennsylvania, went into executive session.

The senate, in executive session, confirmed the nominations of all the cabinet.

FOREIGN.

PANAMA, Feb. 24.—The 10th of February will be remembered in Antigua as the occasion of frost, the heaviest in the memory of man, occasioning damage the like of which has no record in the history of the country since its conquest by the Spaniards.

The cold wave seems to have come from the North apparently, traversing the Cantelaria through Mexico. Tropical fruits and crops withered away at its touch as before a devouring flame.

LONDON, March 1.—General Sir Frederick Roberts, who succeeded General Colley, will have, by the time he arrives in Natal, a force of 13,000 men.

The Times this morning says: By the lapse of General Colley's commission as high commissioner for Southeastern Africa, General Sir Hercules Robinson's authority as high commissioner for the whole of South Africa is called out of abeyance.

It is to be hoped he will find it possible to exercise a beneficial influence on the Dutch population further North, through their compatriots in Cape Colony. Detailed accounts received to-day render it certain that the British were driven from Spitzkop because they were fairly beaten.

The fight ended in a route. The wounded lay exposed to a heavy rain from Sunday afternoon till early Monday morning. The correspondent of the Times, with General Colley's force at Spitzkop, gives the following account of the engagement. Spitzkop is about three hundred yards from the Boer position:

The casualties were left at the base of the hill; the remainder of the troops toiled up the hill, which is very steep and difficult to go on their hands and knees. It was impossible to have carried up even mounted guns. Had we had them there the result might have been different.

LONDON, March 2.—Death is announced of M. Drouyn De L'Huys, the well-known French statesman and Minister of Foreign Affairs under the Republic, and again under the Empire. He was in his 76th year.

LONDON, March 2.—A dispatch from Paris to the Times says: The second constitutive meeting of the Panama Canal Company will be held on Thursday. M. de Lesseps will read another report stating that there are 102,230 shareholders, and that the canal will certainly be finished by 1888, and that recent investigations reduce the total estimate cost to 512,000,000 francs.

LONDON, March 3. The Dublin correspondent of the Times says: The coercion bill will not come into force for a day or two. An official copy of the act must be received here, and forms of warrants for arrest, and proclamation of the districts to be subject to the act must be determined by the lord lieutenant and privy council, and published in the Dublin Gazette, the official paper.

LONDON, March 3.—A dispatch from Mount Prospect to the Daily Telegraph says: The Boers have sent a message to the British camp condoling with Lady Colley in her bereavement.

LONDON, March 7.—A Rome dispatch says three hundred horses have fallen at Cassino; also, the earthquake opened fissures in the streets fifty contributions were made. Many fled from the town and camped in the fields. The Government is sending relief.

Naples dispatch says forty corpses were recovered and sixty-seven wounded sent to the hospitals.

LONDON, March 7.—Various answers to the question in Parliament, to-day, show that the Government have approved Gen. Sir Evelyn Wood's action relative to the armistice with the Boers. During the duration of the armistice both parties promise not to make any formal movement, but retain liberty to move within their own lines. Only provisions and not ammunition are to be sent to the garrisons.

INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT.—The scene at a few minutes before 12 o'clock was brilliant and imposing. The Senators were generally in place, looking well despite their night session. Conkling and David Davis sat together discussing with each other. Adjoining them were Thurman, Hamlin and Blaine, the new Secretary of State. Keenan, of New York, and Windom, the prospective Secretary of the Treasury, sat together. Booth, of California, and Wade Hampton were further back. This was Mr. Booth's last appearance on the Senatorial stage. Gov. Forster, of Ohio, sat near Mr. Lamar, of Mississippi.

Before the House made its formal entrance, many of the members came over and pre-empted good seats.

The most prominent among the diplomatic corps was Sir Edw. Thornton, the British Minister, but all wore gorgeous costumes and enjoyed the display.

Just before 12 o'clock the President elect, accompanied by the old Cabinet officers, Evarts, Schurz and the rest, came in and took front seats, all the Senators and members arising as they entered.

The same tribute was paid a moment later to Vice President Arthur as he entered. Then he was sworn in, and made a short address which was applauded. After a pause the House of Representatives entered, but unadjourned, and took seats.

At the hour of 12 one-third of the Senate were out of office, among them such as Wallace, Thurman, and others of great prominence in public affairs.

At 12:10 the customary prayer was offered, all on the floor rising. The President's proclamation calling the special session of the Senate was then read, the names of the newly elected Senators were called over, and they were severally sworn; the roll of the whole Senate was called and the Senators present answering to their names. This completed the formal proceedings in the Chamber.

A procession to the platform was then formed, the occupants of the gallery quitting their seats and making a break in the same direction.

The Senatorial pagent dissolved and the new scene for the platform was next enveloped, this time the outside multitude assisting and making up an extraordinary spectacle.

The scene on the east front of the Capitol was made up of the official magnates on the platform, and a crowd of some ten to fifteen thousand people below, relieved by various military organizations. In the rear and to the sides and in the background was a snowy field. There were a few cavalry horses.

The new President's inaugural was an unusually long one. He read from manuscript, and it was some time before any applause came. After that there was only a fair amount of applause.

The approaches to the Capitol on the Avenue were all thronged with spectators, including many regimental organizations. The Avenue from the foot of the Capitol to the Treasury Department seemed to be alive with people, with probably double or three times the number in front of the Capitol. In short, the pageant and throng probably exceeded in numbers and show, if not in enthusiasm, anything of the kind ever before seen in America.

RESOLUTIONS OF LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, AND ANSWER OF AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

MR. EDITOR: For the information of all concerned, I send the following for publication in the ADVOCATE.

JOHN T. SAWYER,
Secretary La. Conference.

CONFERENCE RE OUR.

Your committee to whom was referred the Bible Cause, beg leave most respectfully to report that:

We rejoice to know that the blessed Word of God, is now being printed and published in upwards of two hundred languages and dialects of the babbling earth, including Globes for the blind.

While we thus would rejoice in the widespread distribution of the Holy Word of God, we lament that our own field of labor within the bounds of the Louisiana Conference, has not been self-sustaining, from various causes, unnecessary to be detailed.

We find on pages 2d and 3d of the communication directed to the Louisiana Annual Conference, now in session, and signed by Rev. J. Ivy, agent for the Southwestern Bible Society, located in the City of New Orleans, the following language:

"This work has been performed almost entirely at the expense of the Parent Society, which has continued to make its liberal grants of books, otherwise, the Society could hardly have done enough to vindicate the propriety of a perpetuation of its existence."

This language plainly and emphatically expresses a want to be supplied, and the necessity of a change of the connection of the Louisiana Annual Conference with the Southwestern Bible Society, and some plan inaugurated by which a more liberal support may be rendered by this field, to the Southwestern Bible Society, and the Bible Cause.

For these reasons your committee would suggest the propriety of direct communication and communion, with the Parent Board, and that the American Bible Society be requested to appoint an agent under its own authority and for this field.

Resolved, Therefore, that the Louisiana Annual Conference, through its Secretary, request the appointment of such agent by the American Bible Society.

T. K. FAINT LEROY,
J. W. HARMON.

ANSWER OF AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

BIBLE HOUSE, ASTOR PLACE,
NEW YORK, January 8, 1881.

REV. JOHN T. SAWYER, New Orleans, La.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 27th inst., enclosing the resolution passed by the Louisiana Conference, of the M. E. Church, South, was duly received. Your letter and the Minute from the Conference Journal, were presented to the committee on agencies. I was requested to inform the Conference through you, that for many years the Southwestern Bible Society has had for its field, the State of Louisiana and Southern Mississippi. For the American Bible Society to appoint an agent to labor within the bounds of an auxiliary, would be regarded as an intrusion. We regret that the Southwestern Bible Society has not been more cordially sustained by the churches, and that they have not more generally and liberally contributed to its support. The work which that Society has been doing the past few years, by grants made by the American Bible Society, should be acknowledged by the churches. Let me also call your attention to the fact, that [illegible] of the [illegible] Bible Society, belongs to the M. E. Church, South, and is, I think, a member of your Conference.

Yours very truly,
ALEX. M'LEAN.

A Model Circuit.

Rocky Springs Circuit, Vicksburg District, Mississippi Conference, has adopted the practice of paying the preachers in full, at each quarterly meeting. The stewards have, furthermore, voluntarily added to the amount assessed their charge for the Presiding Elder. W. W. Simmons, is the efficient preacher in charge. W. J. Lum is the Recording Steward, sustained by worthy fellow-stewards.

A magnanimous people, besides preserving their ministers from paralyzing pecuniary trouble, do naturally elicit the very best service of which those ministers are capable.

INDIAN TEA IN AMERICA.—The news comes from the other side, that a syndicate has been formed in Calcutta, for the introduction of Indian teas, into this country and Canada. An expert is to be sent to the principal centers of trade, to confer with the large tea dealers and exporters, to find out what varieties will meet with the readiest sale here, and get them interested in the scheme. It is a matter of doubt if any scheme of this sort can be brought to success. The manner of tea manufacture in India produces an article which does not suit the tastes of the average American consumer, and radical changes would have to be made before an acceptable article to the people of this country would be produced. The Indian tea as a rule strong and rough, and even in England where the majority of the Indian product is taken, it has to be mixed with China tea before it gets to the consumer. Attempts have been made for ten years past, to introduce these teas into this country, but they have, without an exception met with failure. It is true the attempts have been desultory, and consisted in sending samples or small consignments to New York houses. If it was possible for Indian teas to be introduced here the syndicate could hardly have chosen a worse time at which to commence their experiment, for the tea market is, and has been very much depressed, by the excessive stocks and the persistent efforts of some of the older importing houses, to bear the market through the medium of heavy auction sales, and thereby forcing some of smaller importers to the wall. There is very little difference between the quality of the tea leaf raised in China, India, and the United States. The quality of flavor of the leaf is developed by its treatment; for instance, English breakfast is fermented; Oolong is not. There can be no doubt but that if the Indian tea growers will make their tea as good or as suitable to American tastes as is the Chinese article, and can sell it at a sufficiently low price a trade can be developed. But if in the efforts of Commissioner of Agriculture, Le Duc are successful, and they bid fair to be, we will, in the course of time raise our own tea, and the efforts of our Indian friends will have proved migratory.—Americus.

—The Queen's Palace Church in Antananarivo, Madagascar, was opened recently with interesting services. It was arranged that none but native ministers should officiate; the missionaries were present, but took no part, for her majesty did not wish to favor one society more than another. The queen sat on an elevated seat, in plain clothes, and the prime minister told the people that everywhere outside of the church they must honor and pay due respect to their sovereign; but that day, in the house of God, they were all brethren and sisters in Christ; hence her majesty appeared among them in plain apparel. The services continued through several days.

Roger Moore was ninety when the summons came to him. He entered the ministry in 1815, and spent the first thirteen years of his public life in missionary service. He was an able and a useful man, and his end was peace.

Robert Jackson was another venerable minister whose term of service was eight years over half a century. He had two brothers who were presidents of the Conference, and one attained to that honor twice, Samuel Leigh in 1837 after fifty-five years of service. Thomas followed him in 1873, after sixty-nine years of labor, and now Robert is called to join them in the song and service of the Church triumphant. No two of brothers ever rose to such eminence in Wesleyanism, and although many Jacksons continue on the itinerant roll of Wesleyanism, none of them, I think, are sons of these distinguished men. Until the Conference of 1879 they had two nephews in the Wesleyan ministry, viz., A. Jackson Wray and his brother Samuel. The former seceded more than a year ago to Independency, and is now pastor of a Congregational church in London.

The State trials in Dublin have ended in the acquittal of Parnell and his friends. Two of the twelve jurymen were for conviction. The Home Rulers are jubilant and will pursue their tactics of obstruction in the House of Commons with greater persistency and audacity than ever, but the House of Commons will assert its dignity as the most ancient and eminent legislative body in the world by dealing summarily and effectually with the Obstructionists. They are becoming an intolerable nuisance. Their insolent tyranny is unbearable and should not be tolerated for an hour.

DISCIPLINE.

Conservatism.

What is conservatism? The Church of Rome understands it to mean fixedness of form, rigidity of outline, and the result is, that Protestantism points to her as a museum of ritualistic fossils, that have long ago lost whatever meaning they might have once possessed.

According to Webster, to conserve is "to keep in a safe or sound state; to save; to preserve; to protect." Conservatism, then, requires such adaptations of form to the living spirit, as shall maintain its power and effectiveness.

Whatever mistake on this point the Church of Rome may have made, or the principle that "those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones," Methodists ought to be sparing of their ridicule. Let it be remembered that among the "General Rules," that the Discipline requires each pastor to read to his congregation at least once a year, is one forbidding "the putting on of gold and costly apparel." And what does it amount to? A pastor dressed in broadcloth and wearing gold buttons and a gold chain, stands at the altars of the church and receives into full membership an applicant dressed in silk and wearing diamonds, and when he asks, "Will you be subject to the Discipline of the church," she answers, "I will endeavor so to do by the help of God."

Are they both sincere? Of course they are, and are doubtless true, earnest Christians. Do they expect to rake all these forbidden things? Certainly not; for he gets up the following Sunday, in the same dress, before a congregation that is richly dressed, and goes through the farce of reading this same rule. The truth is, both these parties and the church at large understand this rule as obsolete.

Whether it was originally a wise rule, whether it ought to be obsolete, we are not now discussing. We are simply considering the fact that it is obsolete. Is it ever enforced? Is it ever intended to be? Has it been enforced in any instance for twenty-five years?

Many enthusiastic brother zealots for the purity and simplicity of Methodism, should attempt to enforce it, and begin to expel members for its violation, the result would be that his Conference would logate him for inefficiency, and for having more zeal than wisdom.

What are we going to do about it? Shall we continue to publish and read it and disobey it, simply because we received it from Wesley? I honor the name of Wesley and love with my whole heart the church that he organized; and because I love it, I desire to see her consistent with herself and with common sense. It certainly adds nothing to the spiritual power or dignity of the church, to stand guard forever around the cold, dead body of a defunct rule, simply because it came from Wesley. Methodism has too grand a conflict before her, to be marching to battle, loaded down with her corpses. If the rule is right, if it is wise, and its enforcement will add to her power for good, let the church say so. If its enforcement is no longer wise or necessary or possible, in the name of consistency, and in obedience to the highest conservatism, let us bury it decently, and no longer embarass the enforcement of a wise and necessary discipline, by cumbering our statutes with a law that we neither expect to obey nor enforce.

CONSERVATIVE.

China Missions—Special Meeting.

The China Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, met in Shanghai, January 11, 1881, and was opened with prayer by Dr. Young J. Allen, D. D. Dr. W. R. Lambuth presided. The following members of the mission were present: Young J. Allen, D. D., W. R. Lambuth, M. D., W. W. Royall, K. H. McLain, G. R. Loehr, and A. P. Parker.

On motion it was resolved that the meeting for estimates be held, hereafter, on the Thursday on or just before the twentieth of February. Also moved and carried that the account books of the treasurer, and of the various districts be audited at the estimates meeting in February. C. F. Reid and W. W. Royall were appointed a committee to audit the accounts of last year.

The estimates of the amounts necessary to be appropriated by the Board of Missions for the China Mission, for the year ending September 30, 1882, were then made out in detail and will be sent, and acted on by the Board in due time.

On motion the salaries of personal teachers were fixed at one hundred per annum.

Moved and carried that the property now occupied by Mr. T. H. Thompson, of the P. E. mission and soon to be vacated be rented for the use of our mission, and Dr. W. R. Lambuth was appointed a committee of one to effect this result. The following motion made by Dr. W. R. Lambuth and seconded by A. P. Parker was adopted, viz.: "To sell the native parsonage, take a necessary amount of the proceeds and purchase the Clopton School for a native parsonage, pull down the present mission residence and Christmas chapel, use the site of same on which to build the new church, then purchase another lot on which to build a mission residence. On motion it was resolved that the work at Fih Pan be taken into our mission if offered to us by the P. E. mission, who now have charge of it. C. F. Reid presented a report of expenditures in building a mission residence in Nan sing. The cost having exceeded the appropriation by $49, the Board of Missions were requested to make an appropriation to defray said extra expense.

W. R. Lambuth and G. R. Loehr were on motion appointed a building committee, of which, who ever has special charge of any building, shall for the time being be ex officio chairman.

On motion W. W. Royall was elected treasurer of the China Mission, after which the meeting adjourned, and was closed with prayer by A. P. Reid.

Religious service was held at Dr. Lambuth's at night, led by Dr. Allen. Several brethren spoke of their early Christian experience, their call to the ministry and to the mission field, the joys and trials of mission work, etc. It was good to be here. We felt the presence of the Master. It reminded me of a Conference love feast. I think that was one of the happiest days I have spent in China. How our hearts were strengthened by the presence of those newly arrived brethren. O, may many, many more like them speedily follow to join in this hard but glorious work.

The interest in the work at Tong Tsang is increasing. Several more seem to be almost ready to become Christians, and all who have been sending their children to the native school there, seem to be quite ready now to allow their children to spend half the time in studying Christian books. The bridge at the entrance of the village being low, and the canal shallow, the villagers raised the former and deepened the latter, so that my boat can now pass easily. It is all because of their interest in the gospel.

A. P. PARKER, Secretary.

Southern University, Alabama.

ENDOWMENT FUND.

At the last session of the Alabama Conference held at Pensacola, Fla., the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That this Conference agrees to undertake the endowment of a Professorship to be connected with the Southern University, for the present, but to be ever in power and under the control and direction of this Conference.

Resolved, That the sum to be raised shall be fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) and that the principle shall never be used, and the interest only, is to be used to sustain the above named chair of Biblical Literature.

Resolved, That subscriptions be raised, none of which are to fall due until the full sum of fifteen thousand dollars shall have been subscribed.

Resolved, That the presiding elders be instructed to bring the resolution of the Conference to the fifteen thousand dollars, before the first Quarterly Conference, in each charge, and that the Quarterly Conference devise means whereby their pro rata amounts may be raised.

Now, I wish to enquire through the ADVOCATE, if the presiding elders have carried out the letter and spirit of this fourth resolution. And if so, what success has attended their efforts.

Have those liberal, warm-hearted laymen in the bounds of their districts, whom God has prospered in temporal things, been approached by them, and interest of the Southern University and its importance to the church in Alabama urged upon their liberality? Have the members of the Alabama Conference, whose sons are educated at the University free of tuition, presented the claims of this Institution to their people? Have they talked Southern University, and prayed Southern University until their several charges have felt that something must be done to sustain and build it up? Are the Methodists of Alabama aware of the fact that many of the most efficient and acceptable preachers in their Conference were poor boys, unable to educate themselves, and would have been wholly unprepared to do the great work assigned them, but for the assistance they received by a year or two of study and training at the Southern University?

Surely if we, as Methodists of Alabama, felt that interest in the Southern University that we ought, and worked for it as we should, something satisfactorily could be accomplished. Think of it, you whom God has prospered, think of the poor boys whom God has called to the ministry of the gospel of Jesus Christ, who for want of mental culture and training, are shrinking back and saying, woe is me if I preach and the gospel, yet to do so without more knowledge, better education. I can not. What a curse to them, what a blessing to the church if you would come with your thousands and tens of thousands and provide a way for their education and Christian culture at the Southern University. Who will do something now. Speak to your pastor or presiding elder and they will aid you to carry out your benevolent design.

A PRESTON.

D. M'Ferrin on Sunday-School Literature.

MR. EDITOR: As an officer of the General Conference, I take positive ground in regard to our Sunday-school literatures. I have been modestly but earnestly urging preachers and Sunday-school superintendents to introduce and retain the papers and books of our own church in all our Sunday-schools; but now I go farther, and assume that no preacher, no superintendent, has a right to exclude from our Sunday-schools our own church literature and introduce other publications instead thereof. The Discipline insists:

1. That "wherever ten persons can be collected for that purpose, a Sunday-school should be formed."

2. That those "schools shall be under the control of our own church."

3. It is the duty of preachers: "to diligently instruct the children in every place."

4. It is directed that the District Conference shall enquire "as to Sunday-schools, and the manner of conducting them."

5. It is made the duty of the Quarterly Conference "to superintend the interests of Sunday-schools and the instruction of children."

6. It is made the duty of the Church Conference to inquire, "Is our religious literature circulated and read?"

7. The General Conference directs: "Let the schools be under the control of our own church, and it is recommended that they use our publications. And it shall be the special duty of preachers having charge of circuits and stations, with the aid of the other preachers, to see that this be done."

8. It is "the duty of preachers to preach on the subject of Sunday-schools and religious instruction of the children in each congregation," etc.

9. To accomplish all this the General Conference has elected a committee of five, of which the Sunday-school editor is the chairman, who, with the Book Agent, are providing books and periodicals for the use of Sunday-schools. From all this it is manifest,

1. That the church intends to superintend the religious education and moral training of the children.

2. That our Sunday-schools are to be Methodist Sunday-schools.

3. That these schools are to use the literature provided for them by the authority of the church. The General Conference has established a Publishing House, appointed an Agent, and elected an Editor, and all these are at work constantly supplying our Sunday-schools with suitable reading-matter.

Here is the Sunday-School Magazine, with Expository Notes, containing 48 pages, neatly printed, with maps and frequent illustrations, monthly, for one year, 50 cents; The Sunday-School Quarterly, 32 pages, with music, and interesting tables, per annum, 15 cents; Our Little People, 16 pages, beautifully illustrated, per year, 11 cents; The Infant Class, a new weekly lesson, suited to the youngest scholars, per annum, 4 cents; Sunday-School Visitor a beautiful sheet illustrated, weekly, per year, 91 cents; semi-monthly, 27 cents; monthly, 14 cents.

Add to these our Catechisms, equal to any ever published, all very cheap. And then come our libraries with their hundreds of well selected volumes. Add to these our several song books, and what a vast amount of superior literature for the children of the Sunday-schools, as well as for their teachers!

The rules are cheap, and are becoming cheaper all the time.

It is true that we have not as much dash and trash in our publications as some persons of dash might wish; but we prefer solid, sound, scriptural teaching, to fiction and romance. We can supply the schools with tickets, cards, maps, etc., all useful as well as ornamental, and we intend to spare neither labor nor money to meet the demands upon us. All we ask is the hearty co-operation of our friends and the friends of the church, and the blessing of God.

Consider these things, and be wise, and let wisdom be our guide. We are greatly encouraged of late, and thank our brethren for their indorsement of our literature and the zeal in its circulation.

E. B. M'FERRIN, Book Agent.

To the Members of the Mississippi Conference.

For general information, I copy from journal action of the Conference, December 13, 1880:

"Whereas, The Rev. John A. Bolton has written a complete history of Methodism in the Mississippi Conference at the request of this Conference, and as Dr. E. B. McFerrin, Agent, has agreed to publish the first edition if it can be had with a subscription of two hundred or more copies, with the amount of funds now in the hands of the agent; therefore be it

Resolved, That Rev. John A. Bolton be confirmed as agent of said history to secure its publication with authority to condense the manuscript if necessary in his judgment.

Resolved, That the profit, if any, upon its publication, shall go to the author, the Conference to assume no responsibility, and to expect no reward, only agreeing to aid in its circulation among our people."

I respectfully ask permission to call special attention to this record and urge immediate effort to secure the requisite number of subscribers.

The weather since Conference has been very unfavorable for pastoral work. But now the cheering sunshine inspires with new life, and activity is seen in every direction. This is a favorable time for united and final effort to give this history to the church. Let us therefore hasten to discharge a long deferred duty.

Though more than eighty years have passed since Methodism was established in Mississippi, we are without a connected published history of what God has wrought through our Church. The intention to publish, within a short time, the "History of Methodism in the Mississippi Conference," has been announced in our church papers, and many persons beyond the limits of our State express great anxiety to possess the book. Names of subscribers have been received scattered from Western Texas to Boston.

A large proportion of the members of our Conference have not yet reported, a few have each sent me from five to twenty subscribers. Prompt action will secure the publication of the first volume within the next sixty days.

Any person wishing to subscribe, can send me post office address, and the history will be delivered as early as practicable after publication.

JOHN A. B. JOHNS, Agent.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS IN THE FAMILY. A well arranged Religious Journal is designed to be something for every member of a household. Its sections, drawn from the Scriptures, are adapted for the instruction of children, and for those who more advanced in age, but young and where the need of Christian faith and hope. For these how many messages of comfort are brought every week, and what consolations is furnished by the eloquent and stirring words of the great preachers and teachers of Christendom! It is for those in these points the religious so different from the secular newspaper for use it is confined to special interests and associations; to the religious and moral, and social, and educational aspects of life and the world that it meets a want that no other agency supplies. It is the silent preacher, the voiceless messenger of good, not only in the households, but on the prairie or in the forest, in thousands of scattered homes where no pastor visits, and where even the intrepid circuit rider does not come. It carries comfort and cheer to the sick and aged and infirm. It strengthens the moral principle of men in business and wrought in society. It interests the young and strengthens those who are on the brink of manhood or womanhood, and just entering upon the duties of life. In these and untold ways it is one of the potent instrumentalities of Christian culture and Christian influence. If this be so, of course the wider its circulation the greater its influence and its power for good. At this season, when families are making their arrangements for the year to come, they may well consider whether in any other way they can bring so much sunshine into their homes as by securing the weekly visits of a good religious newspaper. It is the testimony of tens of thousands, that the influence of such a paper has done more to refine and the family, to furnish useful topics for thought, and to quicken the religious life than any other influence, save only that of the preaching of the gospel.—New York Evangelist.

A church of an old minister is commended to all preachers who are tempted to complain of a small congregation: "It is as large a congregation, perhaps, as you will want to account for at the day of judgment."

In looking back upon our youth, I see methinks a wild fruit-tree rich in leaf and blossom, and it is surprising enough to mark how very few of the blossoms have set, and how diminutive and imperfectly formed the fruit is into which every perfective law have been developed. A right use of the opportunities of instruction afforded us in early youth would have made us indeed see my twenty-fifth year, and have saved to me at least ten of the days of my life.—Thrift Miller.

There is no human interest so personal and private as public and universal, that the Sabbath wisely kept does not greatly serve it, and it would be an easy to make an inventory of what the sunlight accomplishes in this world of matter and life as to prepare an inventory of the blessings a day of Sunday rest confers upon human beings.—Prof. Gregg.

Men are bidden by one of the Lord's prophets by one of the great thinkers and reformers of history, as from the Lord himself and for the sake of their own good to come back from the way of iniquity to the way of religious integrity, to pass from a state of self-seeking to a seeking after God, to repent of sin and be saved for it.

AN EVENING HYMN.

BY PROF. J. F. HOOD.

From deep undulating bowers that play
Through sunless rifts below,
Upwaft the crystal currents stray
The singing waters flow

Till deep within the dew-walled rim
Of mountains, azure crowned,
The goblin's granite bowl they brim,
And here the lake is found.

Alone upon the mountains wild
It wears its sweetest charms,
And mother Nature owns her child,
And bears it in her arms.

Fair mirror of the summer heaven
That bends above its breast,
Or startling sturdy of passion driven
Across its peace and rest.

The gray old crags with beauty glow
From its entrancing face,
And distant cones of gleaming snow
Are grander for its grace.

As fair it smiles as when with blue
Broad arch above it drawn,
Its virgin freshness woke and knew
The kisses of the dawn.

Now pinkbell trailers at age it bears
No shadow of decay,
With lilies on its breast it wears
Its perfect youth to-day.

A crystal tomb of rest it lies,
Sky passings mock mirrored,
Beholding in its depths of the skies
The stars of earth and heaven

Rare beauty of the forest wild!
Who on these heights shall stray,
May leave his care where them last trod
And beat thy fears away.

Every-Day Thoughts.

"Many that sleep in the dust shall awake."—Dan. xii, 2.

This brief passage embodies the doctrine of the resurrection of the soul, since those who sleep shall awake again. The Christian finds much comfort and consolation in the prospect and hope of a resurrection of his soul, and comes at last to contemplate death as his friend rather than his foe, as he looks forward to an eternity of bliss beyond the grave, and longs to be with Christ in the beautiful "golden city." Religion divests death of all its terrors, and lights up even the "dark valley of the shadow of death."

The death of the Christian is but the entrance into a more glorious existence, that "fadeth not away," hence every true follower of the Saviour dies full of hope and free from misgivings. No sinner, however hardened, ever stood by the death-bed of a Christian without echoing the wish of Balaam, "May I die the death of the righteous, and may my last end be like his." But, to the unregenerate and impenitent, death is full of terrors. And well it may be! They feel, at that solemn hour, in which the world, that they have loved "not wisely, but too well," is fading from sight, that "the summer is passed, the harvest is ended, and I am not saved;" that the day of salvation has gone by forever, and that their doom is fixed for all eternity. Voltaire, who delighted in scoffing at and ridiculing the Christian religion, in his letters to Madame Du Deffand, says: "I hate life, and yet I am afraid to die." Every sinner fears and dreads death. Need we tell why? His conscience condemns him, memory presents to his horror-stricken mind the long list of his sins, and these he has now no opportunity to repent of. "As the tree falls so must it lie." Is it not passing strange that human beings will postpone the salvation of their souls, and sport on the very brink of hell? Sinner, be persuaded to seek God while he is to be found, to "be wise unto salvation," and to prepare for the "judgment to come." Do not put it off to a more "convenient season," till old age, for death may come when you least expect him. "What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world and yet to lose his own soul," is a text that should never be out of the minds of men, whether Christians or sinners, young or old. Immortal happiness is a far sweeter flower than any that blooms on earth; "fellowship with God" transcends all earthly honors and riches; and it is madness in mortals to sacrifice such inestimable and enduring blessings and enjoyments to the perishing and sensual pleasures of this world, which yield no real satisfaction to the heart of man, and yet doom their undying souls to never-ending torment in the world beyond the grave. If men are doomed to suffer the pains and agonies of perdition, the fault rests on themselves alone, for God is "slow to anger," "plenteous in mercy," and anxious to save them, and Christ invites and entreats them to repent, and to be "wise unto salvation," offering himself both as a propitiation and an intercessor for the human race. What more could God do to save sinners? Have sinful men ever sat down and reflected on this matter? Have they ever reflected on the entreaties God has used to induce them to accept of salvation, of the warnings he has given them, of the immensity of the sacrifice which God made, in giving his Son, Christ Jesus, as an atonement and propitiation for the sins of fallen man? No; sinners never gave these matters so much as a passing thought amid the whirl of worldly affairs; they fatally postponed religious preparation till old age, and death mowed them down with his remorseless scythe ere they could repent. Every sinner is the author of his own ruin. He alone is to blame. God is guiltless of the loss of a single soul.

But the passage from Scripture, standing at the head of this article, is replete with comfort and consolation to Christians whose relatives and friends have died in the faith of Christ, bearing his cross on their shoulders. They are "not dead, but sleepeth;" they will live through all eternity, in bliss; they will be "joint heirs with Jesus Christ," and possess an "inheritance pure and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." If we live according to the precepts and the example of Christ, we, too, shall enter into heaven, and meet our relations and friends who have died in the Lord and preceded us. What a blissful reunion of those who have been parted by death! Parent and child shall meet around the throne of God; husband and wife shall meet there also, never more to be parted, never more to know care, or to feel disquietude, but to bask in the smiles of God. What a spur is this to Christian ardor and zeal! There is no Christian who has not some dear and beloved one in heaven, beckoning them to the happy, peaceful shore, and withdrawing them away from the enticements of this perishing world. Let us not forfeit this blissful reunion by our coldness and worldliness, but resolve to show the "fruits of righteousness" in our daily conduct, and to strive to "put on Christ" and to imitate his example. Without this likeness to him we cannot enter heaven; we must fit ourselves for the holiness of heaven while on earth.

The New Version.

That a judicious revision of our present English Scriptures is desirable was advocated by many persons more than twenty-five years ago. The changes incident to a living tongue, the words that have become obsolete, and especially the low state of Greek and Hebrew literature at the time our present translation was made, all conspire to make a new version necessary.

Some ten years ago a committee of learned divines in England and America, united with representatives of all the evangelical denominations of both countries to accomplish this desirable task, and in a few months we are to have the result of their labors in a "Revised New Testament."

Now, I am not so silly as to oppose a new translation as if I were called upon to receive another "revelation;" but, judging from some quotations from the new version, as given by the New York Observer from the London Record, I am afraid the long and arduous toils of these learned gentlemen will be a failure, and their boasted translation may either be relegated to oblivion or preserved as a reference for the critical. Had this committee confined themselves to a just and clear revision of our commonly-received version they would have conferred a lasting benefit on society, but, from what I have learned of it, they have ceased to be "revisionists," and have turned into "revisionists," for they have not only changed words and tenses, which they had a right to do, to make them agree with the Greek original, but they have left out words, verses, and even whole paragraphs, to make it conform to some old manuscripts of ancient times, which for aught we know have no better authority than the original of our own translation.

It is true they tell us that these mutilations do not affect a single doctrine of our present version; but I for one want the Bible, the whole Bible, as we have always had it from our fathers to the present time. The long and holy use of the disputed passages, like the brazen censers of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, has rendered them sacred before the Lord and before his people.

That there are words in our present version which are redundant, and some grammatical inaccuracies, and other terms which ought to be changed to more modern usage, I admit. In several places "love" should substitute charity, "lying" for leasing, "let" should be to hinder, "courage" or "fortitude" for virtue, etc.; but what will the masses of our people understand by the Greek term "hades," which is substituted in several places in the new version for hell? as "And thou, Capernaum, shalt thou be exalted to heaven? Thou shalt be brought down to hades."—Luke x, 15, 16. Or, "In hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments." Luke xvi, 23.

Now, I am aware that the doctrine of a place of future punishment does not depend upon these passages, nor to any others where the term hades is found, for they have doubtless rendered the stronger words for hell, Gehenna and Tartaros, into our language as hell and perdition; but what, I ask, will the people gain by losing "hell" for lying, and have "hades" for hell. They go to the dictionary, and it is not there; even to Webster's Unabridged, of 118,000 words, and it is not among them.

I know it may be answered that Tartaros and Gehenna always mean hell; but that hades sometimes means hell, sometimes the state of the departed and sometimes the grave, according to the connection in which it is used. Then, when its connection shows it meant hell, why did they not put it so; and, when it means the grave, why did they not say the grave. They were certainly competent to make the distinction. I deem also that the incident of the woman taken before Christ, and the illustration of the Holy Trinity, as found in the first Epistle of St. John, are also excluded. These, to my mind, are serious if not fatal defects, and justify the London Record in asserting "that the great body of the people will likely still cling to the old translation."

This new version is, no doubt, the most perfectly critical one that has ever been given to the world, and for the student and divine is invaluable; but on account of this non-translation of Greek terms, and more especially because of the singular liberty they have taken to omit words, verses, and even whole paragraphs of the commonly-received text, it seems to me that whatever it may be to the antiquary or polemic, it will never, like the striking and venerable version of King James, become the Bible of the masses of our people.

The Pint Law Again.

MR. EDITOR: In a recent number of the ADVOCATE I noticed a rather caustic criticism signed "Gilderoy," in which he dubs the present Legislature of Mississippi "the Pint Law Legislature." I do not know who "Gilderoy" is, but, from the tone of his communication, I imagine him to be a preacher, and one who would "Prove his doctrine orthodox

By apostolic blows and knocks."

He appears to be one who would convert the heathen at the point of the bayonet, and legislate men into morality; one made of such stuff as made martyrs out of other people.

"Gilderoy" says that since "the pint law" went into effect he has seen more drunken men in his neighborhood than ever before. I wonder what effect the cold, wet weather and the short crops had on these men? Can "Gilderoy" tell me? Were any of them men who had never drank to drunkenness before? They certainly could have got the liquor before "the pint law" took effect, and, to my mind, it is as just to attribute the increased number of cases of scarlet fever and diphtheria in this neighborhood to "the pint law" as to make it the scapegoat for the drunkenness "Gilderoy" has seen.

As a member of the Mississippi Legislature, I not only voted for the enactment of "the pint law," but I also spoke in its favor. The friends of that law took a practical view of the matter, and sought to secure the payment of a privilege tax from thousands of men who had constantly evaded the laws regulating the liquor traffic. They recognized the facts that "prohibition does not prohibit," and that legislation can only measurably regulate and never entirely suppress vice. Law-making can no more root out the evil of intemperance than it can prevent men from gambling. You may force such violators of the law into secrecy and privacy by prohibitory legislation, but you thereby encourage false swearing and greater evils. The remedy is not to be found in law making. To effect a cure and eradicate the evil you must reach the individual consciences and produce a moral reformation. Fines and imprisonment will do no good, whether we regard intemperance as a habit or as a disease. When the thirst for drink is acquired the man will have it, and there will always be found those ready to sell him the means for quenching the thirst, and where one man's money buys another man's money will also purchase.

The use of liquor is neither sinful nor harmful. It is the abuse of liquor that does the damage. And I venture to assert that in this broad country, and particularly in the State of Mississippi, the abuse of liquor is not doing as much harm as is the use or abuse of opium. And opium or morphine eating is steadily increasing, while the use of whisky is decreasing. There is not as much drunkenness now as there was twenty years ago. I recollect when no man entertained company without setting out for the use of his guests the oldest wines and best brandy he could get. That custom, thank God, is obsolete. It is only occasionally that such a mode of entertainment is adopted. Public opinion has wrought the change. Let public opinion go on in conjunction with the work on individual consciences, and make it disreputable for a man to get drunk, and the great end will be measurably reached, but never wholly accomplished. Do not try to dragoon men into reformation. Make allowances for the frailties and appetites of men, and use moral suasion. Good gospel preaching will do more than temperance crusades and all the prohibition laws which men can enact. I believe the gospel of Christ and the power of the Holy Spirit can do more, much more, than law-making can do to reform people. The State has no right to force men to be Christians; such an undertaking would only result in a tremendous crop of hypocrites.

Missionary Ground in Alabama.

MR. EDITOR: I love the foreign missions; I feel thankful to our gracious Heavenly Father for their continued growth and prosperity. I long to see the time when we shall have a hundred men in the foreign fields where we now have one. And I think the time is not far off when we can, with more ease and willingness, support that number than we support what we have now. May the Lord awaken the conscience of the church at home to so plan our work that the gospel may be preached all over the whole world, and let us not forget the home missions. In some places the people are going to ruin for lack of the gospel. I wish to call the attention of the preachers and official men, and especially the presiding elders of the Montgomery and Eufaula districts, of the Alabama Conference, to the fact that there is a great deal of missionary ground within these districts. There are many points, many neighborhoods that cannot be served by the regular pastors, before, so far as the Methodists are concerned, the people are without preaching. We talk about infidelism and the country going to ruin, and many suggestions are made, and plans and theories proposed, by which the country may be redeemed and society built up. Now, what the country needs is the gospel; give them the gospel, build up the church in these dark places, and all other obstructions will give way, and the country will be filled with peace and plenty. "The church is the light of the world." It is the grand conservator of the world. With the gospel preached in every neighborhood, every week, this country will yet prosper; but without that, no matter what theory of politics or system of agriculture may be inaugurated, the country will go to ruin. Give them the gospel, and you give them a force that vitalize and utilize every other interest. Godliness has to do with everything. It has more effect upon the soil than all the "guano" in America. Let the Spirit of Christ pervade the hearts of the people, and there is not an element essential to the perfectness of society that will not gradually rise into life and activity.

Now, Mr. Editor, there is a large tract of country lying on the north and south side of the Mobile and Gerard railroad, between Seale and Hurtville, especially on the south of the railroad, there is a large scope of country to the south of the road from Hatchechubbee toward Glennville, Spring Hill and Enon, with no church or preacher, except one a few miles from Glennville. I have been told there are some persons that do not hear a sermon for years. And on the north side of the railroad, within the bounds of the Hartville circuit, the people are not supplied with the gospel as they should be. An effort was made at the last Conference to organize a mission here, but failed. I think if the Conference had known all the facts it would have been done. Let us give these people a missionary, and thus let the two districts support him.

C. W. SOLOMON.

Morganville, Alabama.

MR. EDITOR: This grand old county of Lowndes, with a voting population of over 3,500 negroes and 1,300 whites, is the first of the so-called black counties of this State to say to the devil and his agents: "No more of your soul-destroying dens in the shape of drinking shops." Four-fifths of the whites and largely over half of the negroes have their eyes clearly open to the evil of the accursed traffic. Owing to the timidity of our representatives, they have been granted this year to complete their work of death; but before another election politicians will learn that it is not so well to be forced up to the good and right as to see the evil from afar, and lead instead of following in its suppression.

We ask all lovers of our Master and his kingdom to rejoice with and pray for us, that we may have grace to use this blessing to the sanctifying of all his children of every denomination, the conversion of every unregenerate soul, white and black, and the bringing into the Sabbath-school every child in this county, that we may indeed be a people whose God is the Lord.

We asked, and he gave. We will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord for the conversion of this entire people. Nothing short of it will do.

Now, brethren, of all denominations in Lowndes, let us put our Lord to the test, and see if he will not pour upon us such a blessing as will wake up the balance of our State. Christ is our all. All the good we want he can and will give. Will the Baptist and Presbyterian papers in Alabama please copy?

Yours, etc, GEO. S. GILMER.

Logansport Mission.

MR. EDITOR: We left home last Saturday morning, in company with the Rev. J. L. Borden, president of the Mansfield Female College, to go to my appointment in Sabine parish, twenty-five miles distant. Sunday was a pleasant day, for which we felt truly thankful, as Mission Chapel, our new church, was to be dedicated. The congregation was large and early on the ground. Bro. Borden preached the dedication sermon from Nehemiah iv, 10; then consecrated the house to the service of the Lord in the usual way. The sermon was appropriate and forcible. At the close of these services a young man was received into the church by baptism. He begins a new life with a new church.

Though the congregation was large, dinner was provided in abundance for all present. After dinner we preached the funeral of Mrs. Webb. Bro. Borden closed the services by giving the children a Sunday-school talk; in this department of church work he seems to be very much at home. We decided that training the young was his appropriate sphere to work in. The college is doing well under his supervision. Mission Chapel is a neat little church house in the midst of a growing country. Three years ago there was no organized society in this neighborhood, and only two or three persons who had membership anywhere; no Methodist Church or preaching. Now we have a comfortable house of worship and fifty-seven members. Happy is that people who have a public place at which they and their children can worship the God of heaven.

Obituaries.

CAPT. N. H. CLANTON, my beloved brother, departed this life in Markham, Texas, May 1, 1880, in the forty-fourth year of his age.

The deceased was the son of pious and exemplary parents, and was imbued by their precepts and example in early life with a sound orthodox faith in Christian creed and practice. He was raised to manhood near the beautiful town of Tuskegee, Ala. He first took books, a relative of the late Bishop Doggett, in his early boyhood; but her place was admirably supplied by our father's subsequent marriage with a most excellent lady to whom his sons became strongly attached.

Our father died in November, 1856, while serving as State Senator for the wealthy and intelligent county of Macon. His memory, like that of his distinguished son, Gen. James H. Clanton, still lingers lovingly in the hearts and recollection of their many surviving friends.

Capt. Clanton was one of the most generous and unselfish men who ever lived. His kindness and benevolence was only limited by his means, and extended to every class, condition and race who were needy and deserving. He was a ripe and finished scholar. His eloquent powers were rarely equaled. There was no charm in conversation which he had not explored, and of whose secrets he was more or less a master. As a writer his epistles were models of their kind. Though a lawyer, and accomplished in that profession, he was not an eloquent advocate, not so much from lack of ability as want of confidence, which he greatly harrassed all his efforts at the bar. His knowledge was of the most versatile character, acquired by constant study and careful and correct observation of men and things. He was every inch a patriot, incorruptible, and loved his country and her people with unsurpassed devotion. His battery was one of the very last that discharged its guns against her invaders. For a number of years previous to his death he suffered, at longer or shorter intervals, great bodily and still more grievous mental afflictions. It was a sad, and at times almost startling spectacle to behold this brave strong soul, capable of a single crime, or possessed of a greater or less degree of almost every bodily virtue, writhing and convulsed with the throes of an insupportable mental agony, originating in one of the most malignant emotional diseases.

Whatever of faults and imperfections that may have marred the nature, whatever of irregularities that was observable in his conduct, was principally owing solely and entirely to the violent reactionary effects of disease operating upon his supported nervous system. It might be timely said now, as Boswell said of the great Dr. Johnson, if he was without hope of the next life then indeed was he one of the most miserable of beings.

With all his embarrassments of mind and of purse, for he was of generous address and of princely presence, he was wholly unfitted as he preferred ease, the social converse of friends and the secluded companionship of books to the toils requisite for the accumulation of wealth, or the intrigues engendered often in securing high official station. Consequently the space he filled in the world was insignificant in comparison with his moral and intellectual worth.

Four years preceding his death he attached himself to the Methodist Church. For a year or two before his death, he felt its solemn premonition, and so expressed himself in his letters to his far off relatives. He wrote me that he could pray, and did pray, and I doubt not that he met death with philosophical composure and tranquility of soul. His last illness was very brief. He died remote from kindred and amid strangers, whose hands alone wiped the chill damps of death's dews from that brow serenely high, and that mainly form laid they away to await the resurrection morn.

MRS. REBECCA PORTER, nee Pinney, was born and reared in the city of Pensacola, Florida; for a time, during our late civil struggle, she resided in Greenville, Alabama, while there she professed faith in Christ, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and remained a member to death; she was married to Joseph H. Porter, a worthy citizen of Pensacola, and an honored member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, February 26, 1880; died suddenly, Tuesday morning, February 15, 1881.

The funeral services were conducted before a very large and mournfully attentive congregation by the pastors of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches of this city. The occasion was indeed solemn and most impressive. The sad countenances and burning tears of many in the large assembly indicated pangs elsewhere than on the hearts of the sorely afflicted relatives.

Mrs. Porter was indeed a charming woman. Attractive in feature and person, earnest in life, high and worthy in aim, of tenderest sensibilities, gentle in spirit, as the dove, rich in all the graces of the pure and true woman she captured the loving homages of all who knew her. She continued a firm believer in the eternal verities of the gospel as the Lord Jesus Christ loved the assemblies of the righteous and was freely absent from her place in their midst. She desired to live, but feared not to die, realizing, as expressed in her own words, "God knows best." She has gone from us not dead, the good die not.

THOMPSON.—H. PEOPLES was born in Mobile, May 27, 1851, joined the Franklin Street Methodist Church, 1866, was married to Miss Mary E. Bishop, of Meriwether county, Georgia, 1880, moved to Mt. Pleasant, Baldwin county, Ga., removed to Orrville, Dallas county, 1879, and thence to Selma, 1878, where he died, January 17, 1881.

Brother Cooper preached his obsequies eliciting a large company of friends, himself sudden, school teachers and ministers of the gospel as Hamilton Lee, man, etc.

In 1852, when Wesley Chapel was organized, he transferred his membership to that church. Its first regular pastor was Rev. J. W. Starr, who was stationed there in 1853. The consecrated life and unpretentious piety of this godly preacher made a lasting impression on the mind, heart and character of Brother Cooper. I became his pastor in 1858. It will always afford me pleasure to recall the many acts of friendly and Christian kindness that he showed me that year.

When Wesley Chapel was buried, and St. Paul was organized, he connected himself with that church. In both of these churches he held the responsible positions of steward, Sunday school superintendent and teacher. He was punctual in the discharge of the duties connected with these offices.

It was a great trial to him to leave the city, where he was born, reared, converted, and had formed such intimate associations in church and society, but he deemed it best for himself and family to move into the country, in view of the war. During his residence at Mt. Pleasant, he took an active part in all the affairs of the church. In 1862 I was his Presiding Elder, and found him faithful to God. The people of Orrville owe and feel a debt of gratitude to him for his fidelity to all the interests of the church while he lived among them. During the time he lived there he did business in Selma. He would return home Saturday evening, and Sunday morning, at the appointed hour, would be found in his place as Sunday school superintendent.

After moving to Selma, his health was too feeble for him to take a very active part in the work of the church. Again I became his pastor. As in other days, I found him loyal to his convictions of right, and faithful in his religious duties. In all the relations of life Bro. Cooper's "integrity and uprightness preserved him." "His reputation for unswerving uprightness has been commented upon and noted wherever his lot has been cast."

As a son, he honored his parents, as a brother he "love was wonderful;" as a husband, he was considerate, faithful and affectionate; as a parent, he devoted himself to his children's worldly advancement and spiritual well-being; as a friend, he was warm, noble and true, as a citizen he sought the good of his fellow-citizens; and as a Christian, he was steadfast, unmovable always abounding in the work of the Lord.

He was too modest and retiring in his disposition to make a noise in the world: those who knew him best loved him most. Unworthy in his own estimation of his relations of friends knew him to be worthy their confidence, esteem and love.

For months before his death he suffered extreme pain, but he finished his work. He "fought a good fight, he kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for him a crown of righteousness, which the Lord shall give him at that day." W. M. MILLER.

MRS. IRENE JERUSHA ELLIOTT, daughter of Dennis L. and Vice Martin, was born in Tuskaloosa county, Alabama, January 20, 1836. Blessed with pious parents, she early enlisted in Christ's militant host. She was converted under the ministry of Rev. W. C. Hearn, in 1852, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, that time. She was married, December 19, 1860, to W. A. Elliott, and spent the remainder of life near Havana, Hale county, Alabama. She died on Friday evening, February 4, 1881.

An affectionate daughter, kind sister, loving wife and mother, her death is greatly mourned by a circle of her friends, and her five children weep the gravest their truest earthly friend. But on death bed, while admonishing them to obey their father and other friends, she took occasion to point the ever-living Friend, and bid them to strive all the more to study, remember and obey his commands.

Our loss is great, and we sorrow for our dead; we sorrow not as those which have no hope. She lived a consistent Christian life, and died trusting in God, and resigned to his will, with the words, "Blessed Jesus," springing at intervals from the depths of a devoted heart. Thus we believe that she died and rose again, even so them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

REV. SAMUEL.

BROTHER JAMES MADISON MOORE was born near Clarksville, Virginia, August 22, 1812. He came with his parents to Smith county, Miss., in 1833. Was married to Miss Elizabeth Jackson, February 9, 1836. He and his wife were converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, September, 1836. Ever after, up to the time of his death, was he a consistent, bright and happy Christian.

He filled the offices of steward and class leader up to his decease, with great reliability and usefulness. Bro. Moore was a bright light in the Masonic fraternity, filling the Master's chair at his death. He was also the leading member of his church. It was my good fortune to be his pastor for three years. Never ever found in him, as the friend and brother, the home was the home of the preacher, both of his own church, and those of other denominations. His record is an high one. He died in Smith county, Miss., January 5, 1881, in full hope and prospect of immortality, leaving a widow and eight living children, four sons and four daughters, to mourn their irreparable loss. May they follow him, as he followed Christ, until they shall make an unbroken family in heaven.

W. A. SIMS.

WHEREAS, in the providence of Almighty God, his servant, our beloved brother, William Flowers, has been removed by death from our midst, and, whereas, deceased had for years been a member of this Quarterly Conference, Whom Creek, North Mississippi Conference, and of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; therefore,

Resolved, That we deeply deplore the loss we have sustained in his death, but that we bow in humble submission to our Heavenly Father's will, knowing that as Bro. Flowers lived, so he died, in the favor of God, and has doubtless entered into the saint's everlasting rest.

Resolved, That these resolutions be furnished the family of the deceased, and the New Orleans, St. Louis and Nashville Advocates, for publication in their columns, and that they be spread upon our minutes as a token of our love for him whose life and work they are intended to commemorate.

W. B. HOLMES, For Committee.

MISS MARGARET VIRGINIA EDGAR, daughter of H. C., and Mary A. Edgar, was born October 29, 1862, and died at her father's home in Yazoo county, Mississippi, February 8, 1881.

She was an affectionate and dutiful child, possessed of religion, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at twelve years of age. She was unmarried, adorning her profession.

She was therefore well prepared to endure patiently that dread disease, consumption, and to meet fully the monster death.

She assured the writer but a short time before her death, that religion was all and had been a great blessing to her, often expressing herself "as ready to go." Our hearts are sad, but hope survives the gloom. I trust we will meet Jessie "in the sweet by and by."

THE LENGTHENING DAYS.

BY SARAH GOULD.

Welcome, thou early light!
Most cheerfully we greet thee,
And turn from dark, long night,
Gay traveler to meet thee!

Thou com'st with rosy line
To tint the rugged mountain;
To robe the heavens in blue,
And strew with gems the fountain:

Nature awakes to life,
The air is full of voices;
And man in busy strife
At thy return rejoices;

Hope springs up in the heart
When earliest rays are glowing
Its shadows all depart
To scenes of thy bestowing.

Our Pulpit.

Devotion to the Church.

BY REV. FELIX R. BRUI.

Preached at the Carondelet Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South, New Orleans, Sunday morning, March 6, 1881.

If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy. Psalms: 137.

The Psalm from which our text is taken, was no doubt written by a Jewish exile in Babylon, who had witnessed and shared the sufferings of his people during their long captivity. He was loyal and devoted to his fatherland; and it is evident, that he felt most keenly the calamities which had befallen the Jewish nation.

How pathetically are the grief and loneliness of the captive Hebrews depicted in this beautiful psalm. Far away from their loved Jerusalem; they were indeed sorrowful and dejected, and they "wept" when they "remembered Zion." They "hanged" their harps on the willows in the midst thereof." And when their captors required of them "a song," and "mirth," saying, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion," they felt and said that they could not joyfully sing the Lord's song in a strange land."

But if sing they must, they determined that theirs should be a genuine song. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem," etc. Let my right hand forget her cunning, let me sing discordantly, let my voice be unmusical, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, etc.

Indeed is not my object now to consider the text in its original connection. I have selected these verses as an appropriate introduction to some remarks on the subject of Devotion to the Church. Jerusalem with her glorious temple and her religious ordinances, was a fitting type of the church of God. The earthly Zion was but a type of the spiritual and heavenly. And hence for many hundred years God's people have been accustomed to express their love for the church by singing of the love they bore to Jerusalem.

And now, brethren, it is a blessed privilege to sing of our love for Zion, and it may be well for us to inquire how we may prove our devotion. We have publicly professed our loyalty to the church and our subjection to the heavenly King. How then may we best test the genuineness and sincerity of our profession?

Pursuing this inquiry, I will observe that we may show our devotion to the church,

By obedience to her government and discipline.

No organization, whether military, civil, or ecclesiastical, can exist without well defined laws. The church must have certain rules and regulations for the government and direction of her membership. The obligation to keep these rules is voluntarily assumed; membership in the church is not compulsory; and when a man who has come into the church, violates her laws, he is not only a disturber of her peace, but he is a traitor to a government whose cause he voluntarily espoused. There is, therefore, no excuse for his disloyalty, no palliation for his offence.

We can not, then, be too careful in guarding against a loose, and merely formal discipline. If we truly love Jerusalem, we must protect her, not only from foes without, but from those who would break down the walls separating between the church and the world. We may boast of our progress and prosperity; our wealth, our increasing numbers, our costly edifices, and all the outward evidences of strength and influence; but if we fail to maintain the discipline of the church, Ichabod will be written upon the leading pillars of our departing glory, and our power for good will be gone forever.

Just as little as the Christian can be indifferent to the Church, just as little can he be indifferent to the Sacraments.

These are indeed dear to us. Upon them we build our happiness in this life, and our hope for the world to come. Both as to, our faith in the great doctrines of the gospel, and we are left destitute of comfort in our present state, and in utter darkness as to the future. No mistaken ideas of "liberal thought" and "progressive inquiry" should be suffered to lead us into error at this vital point.

As ministers, and private members of the church of Christ, it behooves us to earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." There is no room for concession or compromise here. There is no more effectual way of meeting all the various forms of infidelity and scepticism, now so prevalent, than by preaching publicly and privately the pure, simple, glorious doctrines which are proving now as they have proven in ages past, "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

Too much stress can not be laid on these great doctrines; such as natural depravity, the necessity of regeneration, the atoning and intercessory work of Jesus Christ, the work and witness of the Holy Spirit, the vital efficacy of faith, the resurrection from the dead, the judgment of the last day, a blessed immortality for the righteous, and an eternal hell for the wicked.

And here, I may add, dear brethren, that a most excellent way in which to defend and promulgate the doctrines of the gospel, is to exemplify them in our own lives. By conserving and maintaining a high standard of personal purity and temperance, we may show forth the excellency and power of the doctrines which we profess to believe. This is an argument which, perhaps, more than all things else, will silence the sophistries of men and devils. Truly has it been written:

"A dogma from the lips hath little force;
A doctrine lodged within the mind doth more,
A doctrine in the heart hath double power;
But he is arm'd with energy divine,
Who wields a doctrine in his daily life."

Another way by which we may show our devotion to the church, is

By being faithful and attentive to her ordinances. We sometimes, perhaps, lose sight of the importance of these. While we may offer unto God acceptable worship in private, still it is both our privilege and duty to worship him publicly. We show our love for Christ and his church by devoutly observing the sacraments which are divinely appointed, and by attending regularly upon all the public means of grace.

Those who neglect the house of God, who without sufficient reason are absent from the preaching of the word on the Sabbath, and the social meetings of the week, may in some measure love the church, but they certainly do not "prefer Jerusalem, above," their "chief joy."

But I would insist upon the observance of these things not only in view of our loving the church, but because it is our solemn duty to honor God in his sanctuary; and because he has engaged more especially to be with his people and bless them there.

True, the Christian dispensation is eminently spiritual. No longer are we to regard any place as possessing in itself peculiar sanctity. The time now is, when all who are sincere may anywhere worship God in spirit and in truth. It is proper to keep this in mind, that we may be preserved from the dark and ghostly shadows of pernicious superstition. But we must guard against the opposite extreme. We should reverence the Lord's house, and should delight in going there. We need not venerate the building as such, we need not attach sanctity to walls and benches. But we should love and venerate the place, because the great Head of the church blesses his saints who gather there. As the Lord filled the ancient temple with his glory, so now he fills his house with the overflowing streams of love and mercy. Let us then heed the sacred admonition "not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is." "Let us enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise."

If we are truly devoted to the church we will support it by cheerfully contributing our means for its sustentation. To do this is not only our privilege, but our high and solemn duty. No object does God more delight to bless than this. When Christians refuse to contribute to the support of God's cause, they can not be consistent Christians. They are robbing God, and bringing leanness into their own souls. Whether they realize it or not, they are virtually saying to God, reluctantly and grudgingly: "Here, take your money, we do not want it, we can get along without it." Such giving is not acceptable to God. "God loveth a cheerful giver." Whatever we give to the support of the church, we will be amply repaid. "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase, so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses burst out with new wine." Such giving is expressed in the quaint old hymn:

[illegible]

It time permitted I might show many other ways in which we may prove our devotion to the church; how we may deny ourselves and sacrifice labor in public and in private for the promotion of her interests; how with zeal kindled at heaven's own altar fire we may go forth into the great world around us winning souls to God; how by our personal efforts, prayers, and influence, in all the walks and relationships of life, we may seek to bring men to Christ, to his church and to life everlasting. But there is another thought suggested by our text to which I now wish to ask your attention. It is this:

There is a sacred feeling of local attachment, expressed in the pathetic words, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem."

While the psalmist expressed his devotion to Jerusalem as a type of God's church, there is much to indicate his attachment to the place itself. It was home, still remembered as home; the place where his fathers had lived, and were buried, and where still clustered all the remembrances that could make life sweet and precious. And what was more, it was the place where the temple had once stood, in its beauty and glory; where the most sacred symbols of worship were deposited; where for centuries the Israel of God had offered their adoration to the Most High.

Brethren, there are chords in the hearts of us all that tenderly respond to such a sentiment of attachment as this. How strong and ardent is our attachment to the particular place where we are accustomed to offer public worship to the Lord. Sooner will a devout worshipper permit his right hand to forget her cunning, than that he should forget or cease to love the sanctuary in which he is accustomed to meet with the multitudes and offer up his heart's devotion to God.

Especially is this true of the place where we were first permitted to engage in public worship. Second only in sacredness to the parental roof, is our recollection of the house of the Lord, where we met and prayed and sang and listened, in the days that are gone, gone forever.

It matters not how costly and spacious, or how humble and small the building may have been,

[illegible]

It may have been a simple village church, with its ancient belfry, resting unpretentiously in the shade of ancient oaks; or it may have been a log cabin in the mountains, with its rough benches and uncarpeted floors.

Yes how sacred and dear to the soul is the memory of the consecrated place! There we first became members of the Sunday-school. The songs that we sang in those far-off happy days still breathe their angel melodies over our hearts and lives. The seeds planted in our souls then have yielded a rich and blessed fruitage which will be to us an inheritance of good forever.

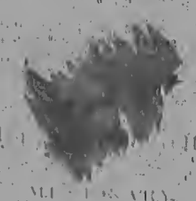
There in the dear old church we sat with father, mother, brothers, sisters and friends. How often has the vision of those dear worshipping faces come up before us in our thoughts by day and our dreams by night!

How refreshing was the living word that came from the sacred desk. How precious those communion seasons when we knelt around the table of the Lord. How fraught with solemn interest the hour when, standing before the altar, we gave our hands to the preacher, and declared our allegiance to the King of kings.

Many indeed, and blessed, are the recollections of the place that come to us from that past which though voiceless is not echoless, though gone is not really dead.

O, the hallowed, earthly courts of the Lord! Aye, brethren, how very dear to many of you is the very building in which we worship to-day. The pulpit in which I stand, the pews that are before me, the organ whose solemn notes have thrilled the living and the dead, these, all these are suggestive of reflections mournfully sweet and holy. Many who once stood in this pulpit, and many who sat in these pews and crowded around this altar, are now in the upper sanctuary with the innumerable hosts, who in the heavenly Zion appear before God.

[illegible] strange that we love this place, redolent as it is with so many blessed memories, is it strange that you should do all in your power to preserve and to hallow this habitation of the Lord?



May it endure for many, many years, and when you have passed away, may your children take your places here. May they be endued with a double portion of your spirit and zeal, and of your devotion to the church of God.

Finally, it is an inspiring thought that while we love "Jerusalem," the Lord is blessing his people. His dwelling-place is in the midst of his saints. His people are no more called to "sing the Lord's song in a strange land." Zion is rising and shining, and the glory of her Lord is seen upon her. The unquenchable fires of his love are burning upon her altars. We are still permitted to draw near to God; and he draws near to us.

True, our worship here is only for a short time. We are only preparing for the higher service and nobler devotion of that "New Jerusalem," which he has fitted up for our reception. Now we dwell in the kingdom of grace; after a while, we will enter the kingdom of glory. Our privileges are indeed great, our blessings rich and precious;

But our hope will never be fully met, our exaltation will never be complete, our highest aim will never be accomplished, until we get home to the heavenly Jerusalem. It is no strange thing, that the Christian pilgrim should sing:

[illegible]
When thousands of ages
Shall fly like moments away
When [illegible]

MI[illegible]ARY.

The Rev. Lyon Richmond Hawkins, one of the missionaries of the London Missionary Society, delivered a lecture in Exeter Hall, on the Chinese People and Missionary Work among Them. The Rev. E. H. Cuthbert, M.A., occupied the chair, and there was a large attendance. The Chairman in introducing Mr. Hawkins, said that it had been for fifteen years a work of love to him to support the mission in China.

The Lecturer first alluded to the different races which form the Chinese Empire. Some 300 millions of these races had been published with reference to the population, but the number was not really known. All he could say was, that it was overwhelming. The census which was called a census in 1851, but there had been wars, rebellions, and famines since then, and he did not think the population was any larger than it was in 1812. He noticed the antiquity of the nation, remarking that the Chinese looked down upon foreigners as the creatures of yesterday, and they believed most firmly that wisdom was with the ancients, and not with the moderns. That was the great difficulty missionaries had to contend with. It put pride in their hearts, and all united them to hear the message of the cross. The form of government was next dealt with, the lecturer stating that the will of the Emperor was the law of the country. As to the industrial arts, he said the Chinese knew little about machinery, but as farmers they knew as well how to get the most out of the land as any one in this country. They cultivated painting and music, but their singing was to foreigners but an ghastly yell, or an indescribable screech. A great many people could read and write, and there was a vast amount of literature in the country, showing that the Chinese were a highly advanced people. He had not been able to find any book dealing with geology, but they knew about astronomy, and they had gone beyond us. They believed the stars were of some practical value to them, and affected their business. Of course astrology was very much studied. They had hundreds upon hundreds of volumes written upon the history of the world, and had books upon medicine, botany, military tactics, and other subjects. In Hankow one of the most striking things to a foreigner would be the book stalls crowded with books on all subjects, and offered at a cheap rate. These facts were enough to show that the people were not to be looked upon as barbarians. They were highly civilized, and the proofs of it were abundant. Most missionaries believed that three thousand years before the Christian era the Chinese knew the true God. How they lost their knowledge of Him nobody knows, but it came to pass at one time that the worship of that God became the prerogative of the Emperor. The different objects worshipped by the people were referred to, and the introduction of Christianity noticed. In the sixth century the Nestorians introduced Christianity to the Chinese; but they went there to teach external, and not spiritual truth, and by the end of the fourteenth century there was no trace of it in the empire. In the sixteenth century the Roman Catholics went to the country, and after 300 years had a half a million of Roman Catholic Christians, but the great majority were very little better than the heathen around them, and many still worshipped their heathen gods. Lastly in the present century Protestant Christianity was introduced, but the real work only began in 1843, when there were six Christians in China. There were at present about 15,000 Protestant Christian communicants, and the prospects for the future were encouraging. At the conclusion of the lecture, the thanks of the meeting were conveyed to Mr. Bryant by the Chairman, and a collection was made in aid of the funds of the Society. London Watchman.

A remarkable movement is in progress amongst the Aboriginal Indians of British Guiana. Forty years ago a young man commenced work among them and waited five years for his first convert. The converts have since become a thousand. Two or three years ago an Indian family from the Upper Potaro river came from their distant home to know more about the Gospel concerning which they had heard somewhat. They have as a people often pleaded for a teacher. A missionary has recently been sent among them who, within a few days, baptized 1,398 of the natives of the Potaro and neighboring tribes, amongst whom were persons who had come two weeks' journey and were living on quarter rations rather than go unbaptized. The missionary of the Propagation Society, writing to the Bishop, says: "In all the history of ancient and modern missions, hardly ever, I conceive, has a case been known where so many at a time, with so little of worldly advantage to tempt them, have voluntarily sought for admission into the Christian Church."

—The metropolis of idolatry for the South Pacific Islands within a compass of five hundred miles, whither less than a century ago from every shore, human victims, dead or slain, were sent to be offered on the altar of the god of war, Oro, was Opon, where the King of this Island was a living idol among dead ones who were worshipped with bloody and most detestable rites. And now at this same Island, this center of cruelty and crime within the memory of men still living, there has just been a great gathering for the dedication of a Christian Church, at which the natives subscribed nearly nine thousand dollars (£1,751, 17s., 8d.) for the church alone, and for the adornment of the grounds of which they are gathering nuts that they may have it all completed and out of debt. The London Missionary Society records are replete with the interesting story.

—The Church of England Missionary Society says on the subject of their periodicals that because of the competition of so many Christian enterprises for support, they cannot keep up their work without making it known through the press, and they are confident that nothing is necessary to secure fuller support but greater intelligence on the part of the people. They say that the Society received "last year—over the counter, so to speak—no less than £12,500, by bona fide sales of its publications." They sold more than 10,000 of the first issue of their Church Missionary Atlas and Almanac in 1878, and have continued it each year since. They have sold 1,200 copies of their Church Missionary Atlas within two years, though it is a half guinea book.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The following is given to show the condition of the Roman Catholic Episcopate in Prussia under the Culture Kampf: "All the archbishoprics and bishoprics of Prussia are vacated, either by death or banishment, with the exception of Ermland, Hildesheim, and Ermeland. These three archbishoprics of Cologne, Treves, and Posen, Posen are without their prelates, dead or driven out of Germany. The Prince Bishop of Breslau occupies more than half of his see, which is in Austria, but cannot set foot in it. He has appointed a vicar general to administer it, but the Prussian half of his diocese, the bishops of Munster and of Limburg are in exile. The archbishops of Freiburg, and Baden, have been absent for three years. Death has deprived the sees of Mayence, Fulda, Osnabrück, and Paderborn of their prelates, and they remain unfilled.

"In the Prussian portion of the diocese of Breslau, of 75 parishes, as many as 40 were without pastors at the close of 1880. In addition to 50 vacant churches are deprived by death of their curates, leaving a total of 255 vacant churches, leaving half a million of souls without pastors. In the diocese of Hildesheim 26 parishes were at the same date without incumbents. This diocese contains now only 147 parochial clergy of whom some thirty are over 80 years old. The Cathedral Chapter has been reduced to four. At Fulda the chapter is represented by one old canon, not enough to elect a new bishop. In the Diocese of Posen, at the same date, there were 129 vacant parishes; in that of Culm, 61; in that of Limburg, there are 30 vacancies, leaving 15,000 souls without shepherds. In Munster there are 111 vacant parishes, with a population of 250,000 souls. In the Archdiocese of Treves, out of 83 parishes 20 are vacant—that is about a third of the entire number. From the cathedral the archbishop was driven, and is now dead; and the dean, three canons, and two honorary canons have died since 1873. In the Prussian portion of the Diocese of Ermeland 37 churches are pastorless, to a population of 125,000. Of the 97 parishes of the Diocese of Paderborn, 142 are without incumbents. To these must be added, 58 district churches, making a total of 156. In the Archdiocese of Cologne, out of 814 parishes 180 are vacant."

There are ten states in which the Baptists number over 100,000, as follows: Georgia, 235,381; Virginia, 207,546; North Carolina, 172,951; Alabama, 161,758; Kentucky, 147,668; South Carolina, 140,142; Mississippi, 122,689; New York, 111,000; Tennessee, 110,847; Texas, 107,075. To these ten states, 1,559,974. This is more than two-thirds of all the Regular Baptists in the United States, the total being 2,206,829. All of these states, except New York, report upward of 1,000 churches, and two besides—viz., Missouri and Arkansas. These eleven states have 17,857 churches, leaving but 5,207 for the rest of the states and the territories. The number of deaths reported is 17,062 and there were 5,569 exclusions and 1,841 erasures. In exclusions the increase was upward of 1,700, and in "erasures" of more than 1,000. Of the 16,721 baptisms reported 1,398 were in Georgia, 1,038 in North Carolina, 800 in Mississippi, 800 in Virginia, and 6,167 in Alabama. In South Carolina, with over 140,000 members and 1,126 churches, there were only 1,500 baptisms, against nearly 1,000 losses by death and by exclusions and erasures."

Rev. H. D. Fisher, district superintendent of the American Bible Society for Utah, Idaho, and Montana, writes us that he is having great success. He has been permitted to hold meetings in Mormon churches, address their Sunday-schools and organize auxiliary Bible Societies also, electing Methodist and Presbyterian preachers and Mormon bishops and others by the offices. He is selling thousands of copies of the Holy Bible in the mountains, and holding some remarkable meetings. Central Christian Advocate.

The London Methodist Recorder says that "After a long struggle the position of Methodistism in the army; put upon the same footing as has been the custom in the navy for some years, and a sum of fifteen hundred pounds appears in the army estimates for services rendered to the troops in different garrison towns by Wesleyan ministers, and for accomodation provided for soldiers in Methodist chapels. Henceforth ministers to the Wesleyans in the English army are not to do their work by mere permission."

—It is reported that a whole town in Italy—Bortolla, near Turin—has gone over to Protestantism from Catholicism. The archbishop closed the doors of the church against the "apostates," and about 2,000 of them sent to Turin for Evangelical ministers to come and preach to them.

P. A. Soguin, formerly a Catholic priest, is trying to found in this city a French Evangelical Church. Services are held every Sunday in Science Hall, on Eighth Street, and a good attendance is reported. Mr. Soguin is recommended by Mr. Chiniquy, of Canada.

The Boston Young Men's Christian Association is raising funds for a new building for its use, and has already secured subscriptions to the amount of $120,000.

SPELL KISS.

Spell kiss? What a silly question!
To spell it—effect means—
No hints I need to suggestion
To spell so common a word
A "K," 'tis a kingly letter,
A trifle distant at first.
But you'll soon pronounce it better
I'd show you if I durst.
Then "I" oh bother that dimple
Just wait till I die dear "I."
The rest of the word is simple
And will keep till by and by.
Then the "S," the sibilant sighing,
Make it as long as you will,
Like a chord in music dying,
With a shuddering, tremulous thrill.
There that "S" is trusted, and sweetly
But wait, are you ready? Yes
I must spell the Word completely
Draw breath for the second "S."
'Tis a most important letter,
It shows that the word is done
And I like it even better,
I think, than the other one.
I hold by these object lessons.
They illustrate things so well
See, you've learned the very essence
Of the word you couldn't spell.

MR. EDITOR: I am a little girl twelve years old. I have four sisters and two little brothers. I have a very nice country home. I go to Sunday-school on Sunday; I do not go to school, but mamma teaches me at home. Mamma takes your paper, and like it very much, and thought I would write to you, and let you know how I love to read it.

The Bear That Came To School.

Many years ago there was a little red school-house. It was up among the New Hampshire hills. This little red school-house stood very near the woods. It was half a mile from any house. It had only one door. It had six small windows. It had no easy chairs, nor pretty desks, such as you enjoy. It had wooden benches instead of chairs. There were wide counters in front of those benches, instead of desks. There was a shelf under each counter for the books and slates. A great rusty stove stood at one end of the little red school-house. The school boys brought in big armfuls of wood to burn in this stove.

One Winter day, when there was snow on the ground, one of the little school boys went out and left the door open. The scholars heard a noise at the door. It was a soft footstep. They looked up. They saw a big, black bear. He was standing in the door-way.

How frightened the little children were! The teacher was frightened, too. The children ran behind a counter in the farthest corner. The teacher came and stood with them. The little ones cried. Some of the larger ones screamed. The teacher trembled. But the bear did not offer to eat any of them. He walked in. He sat down by the fire. He looked good-natured, for no one dared go past him. He turned round and round. He warmed himself all over. Then he stood up on his hind legs and shut the door.

The children screamed louder than ever when they saw him shut the door. But the bear did not come toward them. He began to take down the hats and bonnets and shawls and cloaks which hung on the pegs behind the door. He took them all down, and laid them in a heap on the floor. Then he took down the satchels and dinner-baskets. He opened them. He took out the dinners. He stood there and ate bread, and cheese, and pie, and doughnuts, and pickle, and cold meats, and apples. Do you not suppose that bear's stomach ached? But he was not satisfied.

He wished to see what the teacher had for dinner. He went and smelled at her desk. It was locked. He could not open it. He gave himself a big shake. He looked as if he wanted to say: "Too bad! too bad! I know they sent the teacher something extra nice for her dinner. I wish I could get it!"

Then the bear walked to the door. He opened it and went out.

O how glad the children were! They saw him go off into the snowy woods. At noon they went and looked at his big tracks in the snow. But they did not go very near the woods.

Now I will tell you why the bear came to this school house. Many years before a boy in the neighborhood caught this same bear. The bear was a little playful cub at that time. The boy tamed and trained him. All the children in the neighborhood petted him and played with him. He often went to school with them. At noon they always gave him part of their dinner. One day he went off and never came back. The boys he played with grew up to be men. They forgot the little pet bear.

The bear grew up, too. But he did not forget. When he came down from the northern woods, he remembered the red school-house. He may have remembered the boys. But he remembered the dinner baskets. So he opened the door and went in. He did not go into the plump, rosy, little boys and girls. He went in after the plum-doughnuts and the rosy apples. He must have gone back up to the great northern woods, for nobody has ever seen him since. Little Folk's Reader.

The Story of Stories.

Rev. Dr. Chamberlain, a missionary in Persia, has recently communicated the following remarkable incident from his own experience:

"I wish I could take you to a village in the kingdom of Hyderabad fourteen years ago. There, in that city, a walled town of 18,000 inhabitants, the people had risen in a mob to drive us out, because we tried to speak of another God than theirs. We had gone to the market-place and I endeavored to speak of Christ and His salvation, but they would not hear. They ordered us to leave the city at once, but I declined to leave until I had delivered to them my message. The throng was filling the streets. They told me if I tried to utter another word I should be killed! There was no rescue; they would have the city gates closed and there should never any news go forth of what was done. I must leave at once, or I should not leave that city alive! I had seen them tear up the paving stones, and fill their arms with them to be ready, and one was saying to another, 'You throw the first stone, and I will throw the next.'

"In a way I need not stop now to detail, I succeeded in gaining their permission to tell them a story before they stoned me, and then they might stone me if they wished. They were all standing around me ready to throw the stones, while I told them the story of all stories, the love of the divine Father, that had made us of one blood, who so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life. I told them the story of that birth in the manger at Bethlehem, of that wonderful childhood, of that miraculous life, of those miraculous deeds, of gracious words that He spoke. I told them the story of the cross, and pictured in graphic words that the Master gave me that day, the story of our Saviour nailed upon the cross for them, for me, for all the world, when He cried in agony, 'My God, my God why hast thou forsaken me?'

"When I told them that, I saw the men go and throw their stones into the gutter and come back; and down the cheeks of the very men that had been clamoring the loudest for my blood I saw the tears running and dropping upon the pavement they had torn up. And when I told them how He had been laid in the grave, and how after three days, He had come forth triumphant and had ascended again to heaven; and that there he ever lives to make intercession for them, for us and for all the world; and through His merits every one of them there might receive remission of sin and eternal life. I told them that I had finished my story and that they might stone me now.

"But no! they did not want to stone me now; they had not known what a wonderful story I had come there to tell them. They came forward and brought scriptures and gospels, and tracts and paid the money for them; for they wanted to know more of the wonderful Saviour."

Dreaming and Doing.

Amy was a dear little girl, in many things; but she had one fault, habit she was forever to waste time in dreaming of doing, instead of doing.

In the village where she lived Mr. Thornton kept a small shop, where he sold fruit of all kinds, including berries in their season.

One day he said to Amy, "would you like to make some money?"

"Of course I should," said Amy, "for my dear mother has often to deprive herself of things she needs, so that she may buy shoes or clothes for me."

"Well, Amy, I noticed some time, ripe black berries in the hedges around Mr. Jerrem's field; and the skill that I or any body else was able to show to them: 'Now, if you will pick the nicest and best, I will pay you eight pence a quart for their.'

Amy was delighted at the thought and ran home and got her basket, and called her little dog to go with her in order of going, it came to pick the berries.

Then she thought she would like to find out, with the aid of her slate and pencil, how much money she would make if she were to pick five quarts. She found she should make three shillings and one penny, almost enough to buy a new winter dress.

"But, supposing I should pick a dozen quarts, how much should I earn then?" So she stopped and figured that out. "Dear me! It would come to eight shillings!"

Amy then wanted to know how much fifty, a hundred, two hundred, three hundred quarts would give her, and then how much she could get if she were to put it in the saving bank, and receive five per cent interest on it.

Dolly grew impatient, but Amy did not heed his barking and when she was at last ready to start, she found it was so near dinner-time that she must put off her gathering till the afternoon. As soon as dinner was over, she took her basket and hurried to the field; but a whole troop of boys from the school were there before her.

Amy soon found that all the large ripe berries had been gathered. Not enough to make up a single quart could she find. The boys had swept the bushes clean. All Amy's grand dreams of making a fortune by picking blackberries were at an end. Slowly and sadly she went her way home, recalling on her way the words of her teacher, who said to her, "One door is better than a hundred dreamers."

Josie: The Sabbath, when Josie was three years old, her mamma went to church, leaving her, and little brother, with their papa. She amused herself for quite a while, but at last slipped away into the yard, through the gate and on the sidewalk; then it was but a little way down to the church, where her dear mamma was. She walked on, came to the church, and going in, stood peeping in at the door for some time.

She saw no one she knew but the minister, who was in the middle of the sermon. Her hat was upon one side of her curly head. After looking a while she walked up the aisle with timid tip-toe feet, and sorry boy-nurse she came near the minister; when she looked up to him, and said, "I want my mamma!"

The kind man stopped in his sermon and said, "There she is, Josie."

Some good man who sat near took her up and passed her over to her mamma, who had seen her, and had risen in the seat. She took the little runaway and carried her home.—Congregationalist.

THE COST OF A BOY. It would be a good thing for all boys, and girls too, to get some idea in real figures of what their parents do for them. The Rev. E. B. Fisk gives a lecture on the cost of a boy. He computes that at the age of fifteen a good boy receiving the advantages of city life will cost, counting compound interest on the sum invested, not less than $5,000. At twenty-one he will not cost any more unless he goes to college, when he will cost nearly twice as much. A bad boy costs about $10,000 at twenty one, providing he does not go to college. If he does go, he costs as much more. Mr. Fisk thinks that girls are nearly as expensive as boys. The computation however comprises only the pecuniary cost of raising a boy. The value of a mother's tears and the father's gray hairs are beyond the reach of figures to express. The money side is by far the lesser of the two.

"ARE YOU SAVED, TEACHER?" The question was artlessly put by a little girl in one of our Sunday-schools, but for an instant the lady sat silent with the Bible in her hand, startled by those simple words. And although she answered that she hoped she was, and her young questioner seemed satisfied, the teacher's mind was still full of anxious thoughts and a strange sensation of unrest. The child's few words bore blessed fruit, the teacher was led to consider seriously her own need of the Great Teacher, and when she next took her place at the head of the class it was with a joyful confidence in her heart that through the merits of the Redeemer she could say that she was saved.

Means of an Awakening.

To have an awakening among sinners, there must first be an awakening among Christians. This awakening among Christians usually manifests itself by conviction of worldliness and of neglect of duty, by confession of backsliding and by a return to a closer walk with God. One of its chief manifestations is a strong desire for a deeper work of grace—a sense of higher blessings and privileges neglected, and an intense longing for the fulness of Christ, and complete victory over sin. In connection with this sense of their own needs will be concern for the unconverted, and the painful consciousness that they have not hitherto been sufficiently alive to the danger of the impenitent. The church, for some reason, often relapses into this condition of spiritual torpor, and there must be in it an awakening such as the prophet's vision of dry bones illustrates. The first note of alarm must be sounded in the ears of the church, and here the revival must begin. Unspiritual indifference among the unconverted, their absence from the congregation, and a dearth of conversions, may generally find their explanation in the slumbering state of those who ought to be on the watch tower, and bearing witness for Christ and the gospel. The sleeper to be awakened, first of all, is the church sleeper. When this is thoroughly effected there will be a manifestation of concern in others. When the world sees that Christians are thoroughly in earnest, and that their interest in the salvation of sinners is such as consists with the conviction of their fearful peril, it will itself begin to wake up.

So far as preaching is the means of a general awakening, conviction of sin must be the immediate end. Sin is the bottom fact in redemption. To save from sin is the object of the divine plan, and the reason of the intervention of mercy and love. Weak and obscure conceptions of sin as to its nature and necessary consequences, can never arouse the soul to effort. Especially must there be an overwhelming sense of the sinfulness of the heart, of the utter corruption of the natural man. Outward crime and transgression are only the symptoms of the dire disease. The conviction that leads to true repentance has chiefly to do with the inward state, with the body of death. Men may assent to indictments against their conduct, to the charges of specific vices, and of social wrongs, but no genuine awakening is likely to come from it. The sinner will never cry out, "O wretched man that I am," until he realizes that the root of his disease is within. He must be convinced, not alone of the turpitude of his conduct, but of the utter depravity of his nature.

We may well despair of any considerable awakening apart from this conception of sin. From this point is unfolded to the soul its helplessness, its eternal doom of misery, the absolute necessity of being born of the Spirit, and the need of a mighty Saviour. Ordinarily the conscience is sufficiently alive to witness in the soul against outward transgression, but conviction of sin as a state, and as a nature, manifesting itself in the thoughts, desires and motives, demands special and extraordinary operations of the Holy Spirit. We would make this distinction clear and emphatic. Conviction, to be an element of power in a thorough and genuine awakening, must be a conviction of inward sin, and of the deep and all-pervading corruption of the nature. "It is the heart that" "is deceitful above all things; and desperately wicked." Truly may we ask: "Who can know it?" And yet this is the thing that must be known. Conscience may tell a man that he is guilty of lying, of profanity, of licentiousness, but it may not reveal the state of the heart, or the inward processes which the overt act only reveals. Men may have this sense of a sin, and of guilt in reference to some specific act, and yet there is not that conviction of sin which shows to the sinner that his whole head is sick and his whole heart is faint. Sin, as David and Paul felt it, and as they describe it, is something more than the guilt of outward wrong-doing. It is a corruption of conception and birth, and a body of death, the old man with his deeds, the carnal mind which is enmity against God.

This apprehension of sin comes to men through the special work of the Holy Spirit, but the Spirit usually operates in connection with objective truth. Sin as a doctrine must be Scripturally expounded and faithfully applied. Without this no awakening can be expected. Moral essays and speculative topics are useless in promoting a revived spirituality in the church, or in bringing about an awakening among sinners. Sin is the bottom fact, and conviction of sin the great need. Neither Christians nor sinners can be savingly stirred nor adequately aroused without emphasizing the universal guilt, and the overwhelming corruption of the race. As we drift away from this foundation, and from this Scriptural view of the depravity of the heart, our preaching becomes powerless to awaken souls. "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." It is useless to talk about the balm until the awful disease is felt to be a personal and a fearful calamity. We must have closer and more faithful preaching—a pulpit revival in this matter before we can expect that the world will be shaken by the gospel as the power of God.

Our contributors have been discussing of late a rather vexing question, and one perhaps hard to be solved. Tyerman affirms that Wesley never did profess the experience of Christian perfection. There are some passages quoted from Wesley in which he even seems to disclaim having the blessing. With us, however, this is a question of little moment. We believe that Wesley lived the doctrine and preached it, and we doubt not this is true of hundreds of our preachers of the present day. Many who have been filled with all the fulness of God, and possess the love that casteth out fear, may yet hesitate to proclaim themselves perfect, and they may think it the more excellent way to let the grace that is in them shine in their lives.

We very decidedly believe that we must distinguish between the experience and the profession. If Mr. Wesley never professed the experience, it does not follow that he never possessed it. And we may say the same of many of the most venerable and devoted men in Methodism. So far as we are called upon to think of others in connection with this subject, we look at the character and life. They may profess it or they may not. We have never heard that Bishops Soule, Marvin or Doggett professed the Blessing, but they lived the doctrine, died well, and there is little doubt that they are in paradise. We can call to mind a good many, among the living, who, we are pretty sure, are consecrated Christians, living in readiness for death and the judgment, in whose experience there is not a fleck of doubt, and yet they have made no distinctive profession of entire sanctification.

Why should we judge one another in this matter? It is our duty to confess Christ before men, a duty and a privilege on suitable occasions, to tell what God has done for our souls, but shall we condemn the holiest and most devoted, who hesitate to proclaim, in technical terms, that they have attained to Christian perfection? We only plead for some latitude and liberty in the premises. We do not condemn those who profess the blessing, nor do we condemn those who do not. "Let every man be persuaded in his own mind." Our views on this point would be the same, whether or not it could be proved that Mr. Wesley professed to have experienced what he describes as the "second blessing" or entire sanctification. However it may have been with Wesley, certainly thousands of others, as good and holy as he, have lived and died without making this special profession. We are persuaded that many have the blessing, and, for substance, profess it, who yet do not apprehend it as a second blessing, and who shrink from proclaiming themselves as perfect. Can we not allow of some liberty herein, and while insisting upon salvation from sin, and the love that casteth out fear, leave the profession, and the terms of it, to the individual conscience?

The subject of clerical coats was pretty fully discussed in these columns, pro and con, some time ago. And now Bishop Keener, in his interesting letter last week, tells us that such garb is prohibited by law in Mexico. Our friends going out there as missionaries, henceforth, will of course make a note of the Bishop's statement. Personally, we rather like the straight-breasted coats, though we have never been able, from considerations of economy and domestic peace, to have one. They are certainly very neat, and, to some forms, exceedingly becoming. We could wish that they were the general fashion, and not so distinctively clerical. Everybody that choses wears a white cravat, and at no risk of being taken for a preacher. Why should it not be so with these gracefully-fitting coats?

But it is not our purpose to recall a controversy which probably left the matter about where it started, and with reference to which we have not taken side. We like the fashion of the coat, and the men who wear them are among the best we know. In a general way, it is true that the dress has its influence in the impression which a preacher makes. We remember how very trim and elegant John Newland Maffit always appeared, and also how splendidly a rich and plain suit set off the fine person of Dr. Bascom. We will not disguise the fact that we like to see the preacher well dressed. His clothes should fit him, and be of good quality, and his people should see that he can afford to dress well. He should not be a fop nor a dandy, nor affect to be "the glass of fashion and the mold of form," and yet he should be well dressed.

There are few preachers who are great enough to despise these minor matters, or who can afford to be slovenly, careless or untidy. To be a slouch in the pulpit, or out of it, is not edifying in a minister of the gospel. If it be an affectation it discounts his influence, as all affectations do; and, if it be indifference, he needs to be reproved. If the shocking tad hat and the threadbare suit are the evidences of poverty, our reproof is not to the preacher who dresses according to his means, but for the people who have the conscience to be served by a man in shabby attire.

Educational.

My heart was made glad last week by reading the announcement of Dr. Haygood that Mr. Seney, of New York had given $10,000 to my alma mater, Emory College. Four years spent in her halls and groves, if they failed to give me the elementary truths and the ambition with which to construct an honored and useful manhood, certainly did not fail to endow me with a number of undying friendships, and an inexhaustible fund of happy reminiscences. It was there I learned to love Bishop Pierce, Drs. Means, Sasnet, Stone, Bonnell, Orr, O. L. Smith and L. M. Smith, my preceptors; and there, as collegians and room-mates and classmates, I learned to love Noland, of Kentucky, Easterling, of Texas, Harrington and Hunnicutt, of Mississippi, "Old Shea," of Louisiana, Cook, Mercer, Bass, Scott, Jones, and a host of others, of Georgia; Star, Dowdel, Ellison, Perry, of Alabama, Motley I have known always, altogether, and there, too, I first met a certain modest little maiden, to whom I told a certain little secret by the mellow moonlight, and gave a gold ring—and so forth and so on, through the whole book. Of course, the good fortune of Emory rejoices me, and from my heart do I most sincerely thank the generous donor, for this munificent gift, and most devoutly wish that he, or some other noble soul, would repeat it over a hundred times.

But Mr. Seney has done in reality only about the one thousandth part of what I have done in imagination more than a thousand times for Emory, and every other Southern Methodist college. What a glorious fool a Methodist preacher, riding alone through the piney woods, can make of himself, dreaming dreams and seeing visions by the hour. What magnificent structures of brick and stone he builds! What libraries, museums and apparatus he collects! and what imperishable monuments he erects through the campus to the greatness of genius and goodness! Oh! the immeasurably delicious ecstacy, until some unexpected turn of thought throws his mind on a collection he is to take the next Sunday, and rudely awakes him to the wilting consciousness that he has not a dollar to give. Well, there is one preacher yet in Alabama who to-night wishes he was rich, big rich, and then, "if he knows his own heart, and he thinks he does," the schools of the church would very soon feel the bounding pulse of full, joyous life.

Our schools are excellent, yes, excellent of their sort. The teaching is accurate, thorough, broad. No shaky work is done or permitted. Half shapen stones are not wrapped up in marbleized oil-cloth, so fitted and pressed and varnished as to look to unpractised eyes like polished statuary, and turned off as finished work. Such work is a lie and a fraud, and it does me good to say, not one of our schools is capable of a practice so villainous. The methods of teaching, the books used, the systems of government, the associations of the presidents and teachers with the pupils, are all in harmony with the best methods of developing the intellectual, religious and social nature of youth. No man need be ashamed of the attainments of his son or daughter who has gone through the full course of study and training. This is prominently so of Tuskegee and of Greensboro, and if not so of Summerfield and Greenville now, it will be as soon as the presidents of those institutes shall have completed their present plans for thoroughly furnishing themselves unto every good word and work. And yet our church schools in Alabama are doing but a moiety of the good they ought to do, first, for want of material to work upon; and, secondly, for the want of means to keep the workmen free from the annoyances which come from half paid salaries. We ought to have at least twice as many pupils, and an ample endowment for each school.

When the disadvantages under which our church teachers have labored since the war are carefully considered, the amount of good and profitable work they have done for the church and society will be seen to be simply wonderful. No men deserve better pay, and yet none have been worse paid. None should be freer from carking cares, yet they have been under the heaviest strain all the while. Trustees have promised, and Conferences have resolved, but that is nearly all. The work has gone steadily on, and so has the strain. These good men must surely be looking for their reward in heaven, for they certainly get none here. But is it not time for this state of things to cease? and is it not within the power of the church to make it cease? True, we have no large hearted, wealthy Vanderbilts and Seneys at the South. The simple fact is there are no rich men in the South; none, I mean, whose money is not all required by the necessities or contingencies of their business. We, consequently, can not expect large donations. But Methodism numbers its members by the ten thousand, and were they properly awake to their responsibility, no sane man can say they have not the means of endowing all our colleges. Small amounts frequently given, and given from year to year, is our only hope. This can be done. It ought to be done. The Alabama Conference resolved to raise $15,000 this year. That is a good start, even if we fail to get all. Next year we might try again, and again the year after. In this way we will get the momentum and spring of a running start, and in 1884, the centenary of organized Episcopal Methodism in America, we will jump so far over the mark as to surprise ourselves. We are getting ready for 1884, for that year must be signalized by the outpoured treasures of the church in this direction. Meanwhile, however, if any good man, North, South, East or West, has $10,000, or more or less, with which he wishes to glorify God and bless humanity, let him know if he will put it at Greensboro, Summerfield, Tuskegee or Greenville, it will begin the good work at once and continue it for all time to come.

J. W. H.

"This world is not the home of happiness, but the training place of character." If people would believe that sentiment, how much it would facilitate human progress! Ease and comfort are regarded by too many of us as the chief ends for which we should live. Too many of us eagerly long for that time to come when we may relax energy and put aside toil, and enter upon quiet enjoyment. There is ever in view a beautiful mirage beckoning to retirement under its embowering shades, and inviting to repose by its babbling brooks! We are led by the creations of fancy rather than by the desire to meet the ends of our existence. If life is a probation, then character making is "the thing of greatest price." Ease and comfort do not develop robust characters. The means to that end are the wants and hardships and trials incident to life. When properly used, these call out strength. The things which seem to oppose can be made to subserve the ends of progress. Obstacles become helps, because, in overcoming them, we are training the powers of mind and soul and body. The religion of Jesus can make the true character, because it operates upon the whole nature. It takes possession of the heart, and from that center rules the whole man. The reason so many of us advance so slowly in the development of religious character is found in the fact that we control our religion instead of permitting it to control us. By doing this we transform the nature of religion and lower the standard of piety. By this process religion dwindles to a mere sentimentalism. It becomes "a passive feeling of complacency," satisfied entirely with selfish enjoyments. The character that is the result of such a religion is weak, and as vacillating as its own variable emotions. There are no obstacles in the way of such a religion, and consequently nothing to call out strength and develop robustness. There is sound philosophy at the bottom of Paul's exhortation to Timothy—"endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." Brother, sister, don't spend probation seeking happiness, but use it all to train your character. It is character that will be tested at the last day.

C.

Be Christian Men.

Dr. John Hall, in an address to the students of Yale University, as reported for the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, concludes with the following burning words:

Oh, my brethren, when the mass of this nominally Christian community over this broad America does all things for his sake, then we shall be really and truly a Christian nation, and there would be that about us which would recommend our free institutions to the tribes and kindreds of the earth more truthfully, powerfully and persuasively than anything we can do. And that is the ideal I would put before you. Young men of this University, whatever the profession to which you are looking, whatever the department in which you are working now, I beseech you to be Christian men. Not merely to accept a system of religion, a school of philosophy, but to be Christians; that is, to come into the closest fellowship with a Person, a living Person, a holy Person, a divine Person, a saving Person, whom, if it be not irreverent to say it, you take, as it were, by the hand, whom you trust, whom you love, in whose love to you you have not the slightest doubt, who walks with you and talks with you, and to whom you can talk, and of whom you have this hope, that when the warfare of your life is over you will go to be with him in eternal and unbroken fellowship, to serve him forever and ever. And that conviction makes a man holy. It is the Spirit's chosen way for making men holy, and that not in any magical way, but in accordance with the very laws of their natures that God has stamped upon them.

And to know what kind of love the Father has bestowed upon us that we should be the sons of God! Not the name merely, but the kind of it. He might have forgiven us and sent us away into some remote and safe place in his dominions, but the kind of his love is this, that he makes us his children and brings us near to him, and takes us into his home. "And therefore the world knoweth us not because it knew him not." "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

And here is a point: that this hope is the express instrument of making men good. "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure."

We have our temperance societies and I presume they are needed. We have our societies for the suppression of vice, and I suppose they are needed. And we have societies for the better observance of the Sabbath and I suppose they are needed. We, for the present distress, divide up the whole of goodness into sections, and fight the battle of evil in "pieces," so to speak. But when God comes to deal with us he takes purity and goodness and holiness as a whole and by putting the inspiration of childhood into our lives, he sets us to purify ourselves even as Christ is pure. That includes everything. When you are intent upon being as Christ was you will be temperate, you will be manly. You will love God and hate evil and suppress it, first of all in yourself. You will be pure in life because pure in heart, and pure in heart because you expect to see God.

May the Lord make you, young men of this University, may the Lord make you such men! I speak no new truth to you. It is what my brother has told you from this desk. It is what your professors tell you when you go to them and get good advice from them. It is what praying mothers and fathers in their closets have been asking for you for many a year. It is what the Christian people of this country hope for you. And it is in the line of the best traditions of this New England. It was because New England had men of this stamp that she became what she is. And if she ever loses her glory and is degraded and secularized, it will be because she loses her hold of this truth and the hopes built upon it. Which may God avert, and may he bless you and make you a great blessing for his name's sake. Amen.

Popular Amusements.

In a paper read by Rev. Dr. T. L. Cuyler before the late Presbyterian Council we find the following very moderate and sensible views:

What is recreation? We reply: Everything that re-creates what is lost by daily life's frictions and fatigues. Whatever makes the body healthier, the mind clearer, and the immortal powers more vigorous, is Christian recreation. To deny ourselves such wholesome reanimations may be hazardous folly; but to restrain others from them is an infringement upon Christian liberty. The rights of Christian conscience are sacred here, as elsewhere; but conscience requires solid principles of truth for its guidance.

We lay down, then, this principle: That whatever tends to improve the body and mind is right; whatever endangers the moral health and inflames the evil passions is wrong. The one strengthens; the other only stimulates and often poisons. The one refreshes; the other ruins. To drink pure water satisfies lawful appetite and promotes health. To drink an alcoholic beverage inflames a morbid appetite and promotes disease. In the one case the drinker seeks a recreation for the bodily man; in the other case the drinker seeks fiery stimulation and the whole course of Nature is "set on fire of hell." Just what water is to the body is true recreation to the whole man. Just what wine and whisky are to the body, such are evil amusements to every one who aims to enjoy pleasure and yet escape its consequences.

Now, to the tribunal of this simple test we bring every amusement, whether of a personal or social character. Does the amusement recreate the body and mind, or does it minister to the evil passions? If it recruits my physical and moral nature, it is right. But if it stimulates any fleshly lusts, if it weakens conscience, if it unfits me for the service of my God, and defaces my spiritual nature, then it is a forbidden amusement. I cannot take my Master with me into it, or ask his blessing upon it. Wherever a Christian cannot take Christ with him he has no right to go.

Every popular amusement which invites God's people must submit to the tests which a Bible conscience imposes. For example, the theatre constantly bids for the support of Christian people, and of late there has been an increasing tendency among church members to be drawn within its glittering and godless walls. The advocates of the modern stage are careful to chose their own ground—they defend an ideal theatre; but we recognize an ideal theatre no more than an ideal church. A theatre whose plays should contain no line in violation of Christian morality, whose performers should be men and women of unchallenged virtue, whose audiences should be composed of the purest people, and which should bar its doors against every immodest costume and licentious temptation, would certainly be entitled to respectful treatment from the Christian church. But every man of common sense knows that the actual average American theatre is no more like this ideal play-house than the average Pope is like St. Peter or the average politician is like Abraham Lincoln. If our average theatre should attempt to conform itself to such a puritanic ideal, it would be deserted by the vast majority of its present patrons in twenty four hours. As the church came in, the thirst for sensual stimulations would go out. An ideal puritanic stage would go into bankruptcy as speedily as a dram-shop which should furnish nothing but lemonade and cold water, and for the very sufficient reason that the great mass of theatre supporters visit the play-house for sensual excitements. They go there for the very purposes which make it dangerous to a servant of Jesus Christ. They go there to gratify what is carnal in their natures, and not to fit them better for life's highest end—to serve and glorify God.

Mrs. V. R. Hill of Cleveland, Ohio, writing to the Evangelical Messenger from New Orleans, says:

"New Orleans is a wonderful city in many respects. There are very few dwellings as fine as we have in our Forest City, but its business houses are large and numerous; and its levees, miles in extent, present a scene of indescribable activity. There are acres of cotton bales, and thousands and tens of thousands of barrels of sugar and molasses, enough, I thought, to sweeten the Atlantic Ocean. Traffic and commerce are carried on here of every imaginable kind. The stores are large, some of them, and have many most beautiful goods. Its principal streets are broad and have four rows of trees, the near the centres between the tracks of grass, and in the very centre of the street, car lines, which, running under the shade of these trees, must be a delightful relief from a Southern Summer's heat. The carriage drives are on either side of the outer row of trees, and are also well shaded, having a row of trees near the sidewalks, thus forming a boulevard. If any of our party spoke of the beauty and activity of the city, or any of its citizens the reply was invariably: "You ought to have seen it before the war." The war is a sad remembrance to them. The name of Gen. Butler is mentioned, not often by the men as the women, the latter having no great love for him. Our party divided, part going to the Aries Methodist Episcopal Church and part to the Carondelet Street Methodist Episcopal Church. Next Sunday, January 23, I attended the latter, and it seemed very home-like. The same hymns and tunes were sung, all the congregation joining in the singing, and all seemed to have the melody in their hearts unto the Lord. The Louisiana Conference, I believe, met three weeks previous, on the third Sabbath for the new pastor. His prayers were earnest, and his sermon excellent. I enjoyed all the services, and felt as much at home as in our own church in Cleveland, listening to our pastor, Dr. Hodgett. Our stay in the city was made delightful by the cordiality and affable manners of all whom we met."

Rev. Dr. Linfield.

It is well known that this eminent minister, member of the Mississippi Conference, has been for some time past laid aside from active work on account of distressing domestic affliction. Dr. Linfield has, we are sure, and his dear family also, the sympathies and prayers of the people of God. Knowing the interest felt in Dr. Linfield, and the desire to be informed of his condition, we take the liberty of publishing the following private letter recently received from one of his daughters:

HAZLEHURST, MISS., March [illegible]

DEAR DR. PARKER: Under what sad circumstances! I address a short letter to you to present my father's request that you would ask the prayers of the church, in his behalf, in this his great trial and affliction.

You cannot imagine the heavy cloud that has overshadowed us the last six or eight months, and even longer, for papa had premonitions of trouble. I remember when the ADVOCATE first came under its last form how he glanced over it, and after a vain attempt to read, handed it, saying it was last to him, he could see no more.

Though he has not been confined long at a time to either bed or room, yet he suffers all the while in both mind and body.

He ever grieves over the loss of his sight, for by that affliction he is excluded from the Master's service. He requires our constant care, being subject to what are supposed to be nervous convulsions, which seem to affect the brain. Unless we try to keep him cheerful, he is so melancholy, and often weeps when left to his own thoughts.

Frequently in conversation he recalls the names of his old friends in his earlier ministry; many he associates with tenderest, pleasantest memories. However treacherous his memory may prove concerning earthly friends and ties, he is ever at home when he kneels down to pray. Some of his most beautiful prayers have been offered since his illness, conscious of his condition. The great unrest of body and mind, his sight failing entirely out, he unburdens his heart before God, and prays that he may be saved from evil by his Almighty grace, through the atonement of Christ.

I beg your indulgence. It was not my intention to have written so long a letter, but, if you should make some mention of my dear father's condition, you might glean an idea or two from what I have written.

So many letters of loving sympathy and inquiry have come to us, some of which have been neglected, not for want of appreciation, but on account of so much sickness and trouble in our family.

With sincere regards,

MATTIE LINFIELD.

The assassination of the Emperor of Russia, on Sunday last, creates a world-wide sensation. The Nihilists have made good their threat to take the life of the Czar. The best ruler that Russia has ever had has thus been cut off by an organized conspiracy, which probably aims at the overthrow of the existing order of society and government everywhere. Alexander II ascended the throne in March, 1855. His reign of a quarter of a century has been signalized by several important measures of reform, the most notable being the emancipation of the serfs in 1861. There would have been still greater progress and advances toward a liberal constitutional government, but for the sanguinary plottings of the Nihilists, and their efforts to subvert all authority. The Grand Duke Nicholas Alexander, as Alexander III, succeeds to the Russian throne. His position, like that of his father, will be beset with personal peril, and with many perplexing problems in the art of government. Whether he will adopt a sterner despotism, or pursue a path of liberal reform, depends upon the temper of the man, and also upon the circumstances that surround him.

Rev. L. H. Chapelle, in charge of the Stockton circuit, Alabama Conference, writing, February 20, says: "I hope to do a great deal for the ADVOCATE this year. I have made one round on the Stockton circuit. I am pleasantly situated, and the spiritual outlook is encouraging. Will send more orders for the ADVOCATE soon. I find that those who take the ADVOCATE are much more interested in all the demands of the church." Bro. Chapelle knows whereof he affirms in this matter. We wish all our pastors were so deeply convicted on this point as to be moved to a strong effort to put a copy of the ADVOCATE in every household. Brethren, if can be done, it ought to be done. Will you try to do it?

Sunday, the twenty-seventh, is devoted, by our Sunday-schools, to a review of the lessons of the quarter. Before we publish no lesson for that day. The lessons, prepared by Rev. Christian Keener, will appear regularly on our second page. We call attention of our Sunday-schools, and of our Methodist parents, to this feature of the ADVOCATE. Will the superintendents remind their schools of it, and induce as many as possible to subscribe for our paper? Apart from the weekly lesson, the ADVOCATE should be read by our teachers and scholars, and everybody else.

Rev. H. M. DuBose, of the Mississippi Conference, Binnsville circuit, gave us a call this week. He has been transferred by Bishop Keener to the Texas Conference and appointed to St. James Church, Galveston. He left New Orleans for his new field of labor on Tuesday last. Bro. DuBose is a young preacher of fine gifts and attainments, and worthy of the cordial reception which we doubt not awaits him among the brethren in Texas.

Rev. John Lusk, of the Mississippi Conference, sends us his printed sermon on "Apollos, Apostolic Baptismal Succession." Bro. Lusk is a strong champion, and hard to refute. The sermon is full of points, and the style is lively and pungent. People troubled about the Baptist controversy may find rest and satisfaction in this sermon.

—Minutes of the last session of the Mississippi Conference have been received. The pamphlet is edited by Rev. Charles B. Galloway and Rev. W. C. Black. Their work appears to have been well done, and the printer has turned out a very tasteful job.

Rev. John Jenkins, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Hamburg, Ark., Little Rock Conference, gave us a call this week. He represents his work as prospering, and Bro. Connerly's school as in a flourishing condition.

Mr. Wm. H. Vanderbilt has lately given another $100,000 to Vanderbilt University.

—Munsey's Sermons are now in the sixth thousand and continue to sell well.

Rev. I. W. Cooper, writing from Greensburg, La., March 10, says: "I find my new circuit gives me much to do. Seven churches, with two Sabbaths in this place. A comfortable parsonage, with new furniture and crockery. A very liberal assessment. Some interest manifested for Christ. About 575 members—what a force for Christ if all were converted! Mrs. Cooper and I are delighted with Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle." Let all young ministers after finishing the Conference course join. On this circuit are the former homes of Father Pipkin and Clinton. On this circuit the loveable George Clinton grew up to manhood. And here also T. C. and D. P. Bradford spent their boyhood days."

CONFERENCE MINUTES.—All subscribers to the minutes of the Mississippi Conference who fail to receive their copies will please notify me at once. I am mailing to all whose postoffices are known.

CHAS. B. GALLOWAY.

A LIBERAL GIVER.—Mr. George I. Seney, president of the Metropolitan National Bank of New York, having given within the past three years $225,000 to the Wesleyan University, has recently given nearly a quarter of a million to a Methodist General Hospital in New York city, to be open to Jews, Gentiles, Protestants, Catholics, and infidels on the same terms. Among his recent gifts are also $50,000 to the Long Island Historical Society, and $50,000 to Emory College, Georgia. It is also stated that Mr. Seney is constantly scattering smaller gifts with a lavish hand.

$20,000 More For Emory.—Under this rather thrilling and startling caption the Wesleyan Christian Advocate announces that Mr. George I. Seney, in addition to the $50,000 given some time ago, has given $20,000 more to Emory College, Oxford, Ga. It seems that with Mr. Seney there is no end to his liberality, and no bottom to his purse. We may have among us none as rich, but there must be a few Southern Methodists who can give something for such institutions as the Southern University and Centenary College. The Wesleyan says:

A new building is greatly needed for the work of Emory College, that the institution may be equal to its growing opportunities for usefulness. This building will cost about twenty thousand dollars. Mr. George I. Seney, of New York, who, a few weeks ago gave ten thousand dollars to complete the endowment of the Slaviek Pierce Professorship, has authorized the President to draw on him for the needed amount. The generosity of this broad-minded Christian banker has given new inspiration to all the friends of Emory College and will call down upon him the blessings of thousands who will gratefully recognize in him the good Providence of God.

Referring to Temperance Legislation, the New York Observer says:

In North Carolina, Texas, Kansas, Ohio, Delaware, Iowa, and other States, we note with great satisfaction advance in public sentiment demanding improved legislation for the protection of the people against the effects of intemperance.

What is called local option is the form the measure now takes in Ohio. In other places the people demand that the sale of liquors shall be greatly restricted, if not, in reality, prohibited. It is now more clearly understood that it has been a fatal mistake that the traffic has the right to abuse itself to the injury of others. A man may drink or drink or wear what he pleases, but if in consequence of any practice he becomes burdensome or dangerous to the State, if he drinks beyond and becomes a pauper or criminal in consequence of it, the law justly steps in and reduces him to necessary righteousness. He may not use his liberty to the injury of others.

If, then, the sale of intoxicating drinks tends to make drunkards, the State may regulate the traffic. It does so now. A license law is founded on the right and duty of the State to restrain the sale. The extent of that restraint is determined by the wisdom of the legislature. It may be partial, as in this State; it may be almost total as in Maine and Kansas.

In both those States, the political party which favors the repeal of prohibitory liquor laws would be put down by public sentiment. The result of prohibition, or great restraint, has demonstrated the wisdom of temperance legislation.

Rev. Samuel N. Burns, writing to the Western Methodist from Eureka Springs Ark., says:

It is thought there will be not less than forty thousand people here this summer; one thousand houses will be built, and most of those here now will be enlarged and improved. Some are building three and four stories high. A railroad is confidently expected to be built very soon. Visitors are coming now by forties and fifties from all parts of the country.

Our church here as yet is weak in numbers and financial ability. In view, therefore, of the importance of this place and the character of the work, which none can fully understand unless he were here to see for himself, I wrote my first letter pleading for aid. But two have responded up to this time. Brother J. W. McClellan, of Mississippi, and the Rev. James A. Peebles, of Dover, Ark. I suppose a great many people are like a good brother who, in a private letter, said he imagined the growth and career of our city is, or will prove to be, something like Jonah's gourd-vine. Let me say, once for all, until these springs cease to flow this wonderful city will be permanent. The hash water is continually shipped by the barrel. A prominent druggist of St. Louis prefers the water to his drugs. Let me still hold out my hands and plead for help. My plea is urgent! My prayer is importunate! My cry is that of need! "Come—help us."

The Richmond Christian Advocate, of March 10, writing of revival meetings still continuing in Richmond, says:

The meeting at Clay Street, Rev. A. G. Brown, pastor, has continued during the week, with increasing interest. Forty-three have professed religion, and on Sunday last twenty-six were received into the Church. The meeting goes on with every prospect of a gracious and wide-spread revival. Rev. H. C. Cheatham has preached twice for the pastor. Congregations are large.

At Park Place, Rev. John Hoggo, pastor, the meeting has continued, with eighteen conversions during the week, and sixteen additions to the Church on Sabbath last. Dr. Sledd spent most of the past week with the pastor, and there is great religious interest in the very large congregations that attend from night to night. The meeting continues with very hopeful signs.

We are glad to learn that at Park Place there have been in all some twenty-eight conversions.

The revival, says the Pacific Methodist, San Francisco, March 4, goes on with undiminished interest. Many of the city churches are holding nightly services. Noon-day meetings are held at the Young Men's Christian Association, and Mr. Moody holds a Bible Meeting at 3 o'clock, P. M., every day at the Baptist Church, Eddy street.

We regard with profound sorrow, says the Nashville Christian Advocate, the death of Dr. Louis H. Bascom, at San Jose, California, Feb. 22. He was a man of great force of character and dignity of presence. He was a prominent and very useful layman of our church, whose loss will be deeply felt in California. In his death we have lost a dear and honored friend. Dr. Bascom was the brother of Bishop Bascom, whom he greatly resembled in his person and bearing.

Rev. J. W. Kiger and family, says the Southern Christian Advocate, of March 3, expect to leave South Carolina for Baltimore, en route for Brazil, on Monday, 14th inst. We have taken the responsibility of inviting them to spend Sunday, the 13th, in this city, in the hope of having a missionary exhibition, in connection with their departure. In the meantime, let our people send in promptly their names to the Conference enterprise of their support in Brazil.

Rev. Tyson Dines of the Missouri Annual Conference died, says the St. Louis Christian Advocate, peacefully in Richmond, Mo., February 15. A good man gone to his reward.

Personal and Other.

The amount contributed by Mrs. V. Stone, of Malden, Mass., through the Rev. Dr. Wm. H. Wilcox, for Christian evangelization in France, is $15,000. This noble and large gift from one person shows an appreciative regard for this great cause which should direct the eyes of many to it. It has been understood that there would be no more distributions from the Stone estate for a while, but the following additional gifts were made by Mrs. Stone about the beginning of January: Hampton Institute, Fortress Monroe, Va., $20,000; Olivet College, Olivet, Mich., $20,000; Ripon College, Ripon, Wis., $20,000; Illinois College, Jacksonville, Ill., $20,000; Marietta College, Marietta, O., $10,000; Beloit College, Beloit, Wis., $20,000; Robert College, Constantinople, $20,000; Howard University, Washington, D. C., $20,000; Berea College, Berea, Ky., $10,000; New West Education Commission, $12,500. New York Christian Advocate.

The Christian at Work says: "The death of Mr. Henry Morehouse, the well-known evangelist, is announced from England. His work in both sides of the Atlantic received the blessing of God in a marked manner. He was the young Englishman by whom Mr. Moody refers so often as the brother who preached in Chicago for seven consecutive evenings on the text, 'God so loved the world,' etc. He was converted in a circus in his native city, Manchester, during a gospel service, when about twenty years of age, and for twenty years following he toiled as a faithful witness for Christ. His last days were spent in planning to give the Bible to the masses in the crowded cities and towns of England. To this end he kept two Bible carriages and their attendants employed in this work."

The French Protestant deputation in behalf of the Basutos were very kindly received by the English colonial secretary, Lord Kimberley. The deputation represented that the Basutos accepted the British government, understanding that they would retain their arms and under a distinct pledge that they should be separately governed. They are now fighting to keep their arms and to avoid the wholesale confiscation of their lands, with which the missionaries say, the colonial secretary has threatened them; but if their grievances were redressed and an amnesty granted they would yield. Lord Kimberly said he was desirous of peace in South Africa; but there had been so much excitement that a reasonable policy was made most difficult.

—A bill has passed the lower house of the Ohio Legislature for securing a better observance of the Sabbath. It provides, under penalties of fines and imprisonment, against the sale of spirituous liquors, against sporting, quarreling, fishing, hunting, against base-ball and other games, against all kinds of shows, and against labor, except in cases of necessity, or Charity, on Sunday.

—King Humbert, of Italy, recently visited the Roman University unannounced, and going to the class-room of Political Economy, and bidding the professor continue his lecture, seated himself on a bench and remained to the end. Then he went to another room and listened to a lecture on Comparative Philology. As he left there was an enthusiastic shout for the King from both students and professors.

—Miss Mary Merrell recently responded with ability to the following toast in a Western city:

Our Public Schools, may their influence spread
Till statesmen use grammar, and dunces are dead.
Until no one dare say, in this land of the free,
He's "alone" for he "ain't," or it's "thee" for it's "she."

—Professor William T. Harris, who has just resigned the superintendency of the St. Louis schools, has received from divers citizens of that place, in appreciation of his services, a beautiful gold medal and a letter of credit for $1,000, to defray the expense of his proposed trip to Europe.

—Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost, in making known his regret that revivals are so few and fruitless in modern times, said that three thousand conversions used to result from one sermon, but now it takes three thousand sermons to effect one conversion.

Several farmers in Wisconsin, who not long ago complied with importunities to sign a temperance pledge, are being astonished by the presentation of promissory notes promising to pay cash instead of to practice total abstinence.

A circular has been read in the Presbyterian churches South, soliciting contributions to a Memorial Fund to be invested for the benefit of the two surviving daughters of the late Rev. W. S. Plumer, D. D.

The various memorials presented to the Cambridge (England) University in favor of conferring the D. A. degree upon women have been signed by or represent 10,000 persons.

George Eliot left about £40,000, which goes mostly to members of the Lewes family, with the full consent of her late husband, Mr. Cross.

Lord Beaconsfield will, it is said, have another novel ready next year.

Mr. Talmage's salary has been raised from $7,000 to $12,000 a year.

Books and Periodicals.

The Child's Bible Question Book, recently issued by the Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, appears to be an excellent work of its kind. It was prepared by Rev. J. C. Granberry, D. D., and edited by Dr. Cunningham, Sunday-school secretary. It furnishes a general view of the Old and New Testament, and, while it is mainly historical, religious, doctrinal and moral lessons are by no means overlooked. The answers are generally given in the words of Scripture. We think it would also have been well to have given the places, chapter and verse, but this may not have been practicable. We commend the work to families and Sunday-schools, and hope that it may come into general use as speedily as possible. The price is twenty cents. It can be ordered of Lathrop & Wilkins, 112 Camp street, New Orleans.

—The Mosaic Record and Modern Science, by L. T. Townsend, D. D., Boston: Howard and Garnett, 1881. Dr. Townsend is pretty well known as the author of Credo and other works. He belongs of course to the orthodox school of theology, and his purpose in these pages is to exhibit the harmony between the Mosaic record and the discoveries of science. His theory of creation is that there were six periods of immense duration, cosmical or geological days, followed by six literal or solar days during which the creator brought into being the vegetable and animal life now found upon the earth's surface; and that the cosmical or geological days are prophetic or typical of the literal or solar days. This is to us a somewhat novel theory, and it is supported with considerable force and ingenuity by the author. Those who care for this discussion of Moses and science, and are without a satisfactory solution of the supposed difficulties in the premises, will find Dr. Townsend's work suggestive if not convincing and conclusive.

The Cotemporary Review, February, 1881, George Munro, publisher, New York, has an unusually attractive table of contents. Among the articles are: The Moral Influence of George Eliot, by one who knew her; The Laity of Nature, by the Duke of Argyle; The Queen's Printers' Variorum Bible and the Westminster Revision, by Reginald Stuart Poole; The Boers of the Transvaal, by Lieut. Col. W. F. Butler; Woman's Claim, by Emily Pfeiffer; Freedom of Thought in the Church of England, its Limits; What They Are and What They Ought to Be, by Rev. H. R. Haweis, M. A.; Ajax, The Black Robe, by Wilkie Collins.

Good Company, February, 1881, has: Ireland and Irishmen, part 2; A Girl of Cadiz, A Story; Charity; Rose and the Doctor; The Story of a Lion; Sergeant S. Prentiss; On the Edge of the World, A Story; In the Land of the Midnight Sun, part 1; The New Testament and Creeds; Yussef; New York in Mid-Winter; Discussion and Suggestion. Good Company is one of the freshest and most entertaining of all the monthly magazines. It is true that "crisp, pointed, original matter fills every copy." Published at Springfield, Mass. Price, $3 a year.

We shall do our best to exclude fraudulent advertisements of every description from the ADVOCATE, and trust our friends, in ordering goods from the leading merchants of New Orleans and elsewhere, as represented in our columns, will mention having seen the advertisement in the ADVOCATE. We will also take pleasure in attending personally to any commissions for our friends in the country with which we may be favored, while endorsing our advertisers as being worthy of their patronage.

The late Dr. Bethune asked a morose and miserly man how he was getting along. The man replied: "What business is that of yours," said the Doctor, "O, sir, I am one of those who take an interest even in the meanest of God's creatures."

Teacher: "John, what are your boots made of?" Boy: "Of leather." "Where does the leather come from?" "From the hide of an ox." "What animal furnishes you with food and gives you no meat?" "My father."

A pair of new shoes came home for little five-year-old Willie, a correspondent of the Christian at Work. He tried them on, and finding that his feet were very close quarters, exclaimed: "Ma, I don't see how God ever got me into these."

A little North Carolina girl started on her first journey by railroad last fall. Soon after looking out of the sitting-room window in the morning, she called her mother in great excitement to see the front yard full of water.

A guest at one of the fashionable hotels took his seat at the supper table recently, and on observing a waiter approaching to wait upon him, he remarked: "Have they any waiters in this hotel?" "Yes," responded a wag on the opposite side of the table, "the waiters are the waiters."

A new boarder slipt some milk on his bread and was fearful lest it would leave a greasy spot. An old stager, assuring him that there was not the slightest danger on that line, he might look for a chalk mark when it dried.

A Boston lawyer told another lawyer, who asked him a question, that he usually received pay for his advice. "Then," said the lawyer, "I am sending my rights, will tell all you know and give me back the change."

At a hotel table a child attracted considerable attention by saying repeatedly: "I want a cake." "You have had five or six already," replied the mother. "Then I'm not the ones I want; I want a fresh one."

"Sam," said one little urchin to another, "don't your schoolmaster give you any reward of merit?" "I 'spose he does," was the reply: "he gives me a lickin' regular every day, and says I merit two."

Mr. P. Werlein, 157 Canal street, New Orleans, deals in the leading pianos and organs. He requests you to send for his catalogues and prices before purchasing. Low prices, reliable dealing, and full guarantee are to be had at this old house.

"Do you cough any easier?" said one of poor Hood's acquaintances, on calling to see how he was. "I thought so so," said the wit from his bed, "for I have been practising all night."

The man who loafs his time away around a grocery while his wife works hard to support him, can always tell you just what this country needs to enhance its prosperity.

"Doctor," said a gentleman to his pastor, "how can I best train up my boy in the way he should go." "By going that way yourself," blandly replied the pastor.

"Have you dined?" said a foreigner to his friend. "I have, upon my honor," replied the other. "My dear fellow," pursued the first, "what a very scanty meal you must have made."

"I'll punish you," said a mamma to her little girl, "you shall suppose I do so to my pleasure also." "Then whose pleasure is it to punish?"

Said an African chief when he saw an American plow at work for the first time: "That is good. That will save my five wives."

W. C. SHEPARD & CO.—American China dinner, breakfast and tea set, 160 pieces, for $15. Equal in looks and usefulness to French China.

What on earth takes your off to the stable so early every morning lately?" asked a woman of her husband. "Curiosity," he meekly replied.

"I am a man of few words," said Presidegest. "True enough," replied Fogg, "true enough, but you never tire of repeating them."

An Ithaca little girl, attempting to describe a mischievous spoke of it as "that thing what kicks up with its nose."

"Alcohol will clean silver." Yes, alcohol will stick to it and clean all the silver you have—that of your pocket.

The conductor who divided his collections with the company exclaimed that it was a fine arrangement.

Agricultural.

THE GROWTH OF TREES.—Trees record their own history. The stump not only tells the age, but in what years the departed grew vigorously and in what it did little more than hold its own. I not long ago, in Ohio, measured the stump of a sugar maple, recently cut, and found it thirty inches in diameter. The tree had lived one hundred and twenty-five years. In the first sixty-three years, while it stood in the dense forest, it had acquired but nine inches in diameter. After the forest was cut away, and it was left with only a few scattering companions, it soon assumed a superior rate of growth, which it maintained till nearly the last, so as to add twenty-one inches of diameter in sixty-two years. The rings averaged about seventeen-hundredths of an inch in thickness, whereas, in the first sixty-three years, they had averaged but seven hundredths.

In Sweden it is ascertained that a forest of mixed wood on medium soil grows about a cord of wood a year on an acre of land. If much more than a cord is removed from an acre in a year, the production is reduced. But, to keep the production from diminishing, it makes all the difference in the world what trees you take away. Whether you take those which are beginning to decay, or those which are in the rapidest stage of growth. It is only by the best judgment in thinning out that the capital of growth can be kept whole after a forest has become well established.

If we take two trees of the same species, say an ash sapling that is four inches in diameter, and sixteen years old, and twenty feet high, and a tree that is twenty-four inches in diameter, ninety-six years old, and sixty feet high, a little calculation will show us, supposing the thickness of the rings now equal, that the sapling is making 2.18 of a cubic foot of wood in a year, while the tree is making 5.21 cubic feet in a year. It will take between thirty-two and thirty-three such large trees on an acre to make a cord of wood in a year; and it will take about five hundred and ninety of the saplings, or nearly four to the square rod; and it would take more than seventy to be cut to make a cord, so that in growing a forest a good crop cannot be taken away without "eating to the capital." It is not in fact till a forest is made one hundred years old, that it can yield so much as a cord an acre without trenching on the capital of growth. But when it gets to that age, if the right crop is taken, the average cord it yields is much more valuable than mere fire-wood. The right and most profitable sort of crop is the most valuable per cubic foot.

The largest layer supposed, consisting of thirty-two hundred trees to the acre, would make only between one and fifty cords of wood to the acre, half cut at once. But that would be a destruction of capital which would take nearly one hundred years to restore. A capital which, if kept up by replacing every tree cut, will continue forever to yield a net profit at least as large per acre yearly.

A forest not to be pruned, must be managed very much as death manages the human race. Trees must not be taken out faster than they spring up, nor all of one age or sex; only those that are ripe, sickly, and in the way. By adapting the species to the soil, even the poorest soils will yield immense returns. The rocky hills of Massachusetts, which will not grow very large oaks or walnuts, will cover themselves with enormous pines and hemlocks, if they have an opportunity. As evergreens do not, like other trees, perpetuate themselves by sprouts from the stumps, when a forest of them is slaughtered by the ax, their tender seedlings are prevented from replacing them by the sun, frost and cattle; while the hardier seedling of the deciduous woods such as birch, maple and ash, and the sprouts of such oaks and hickories as may have been mixed with the evergreens have a better chance, and thus take the place of the resinous woods on a soil to which well adapted to them. With a little judicious care and forethought, a wood of scrubby oak or hoop-pole hickory may be converted into a glorious timbery, yielding masts for navies. But, as the individual man has, on the average, a life shorter than that of a tree, it requires the State which does not die to do this.

The Middlesex Fells, is a tract of nearly 1,000 acres, within six or seven miles of Boston, of which more than 600 consist of rocky and blue-gravel hills, once covered with lofty pines and hemlocks, nearly all of which have given place to oaks and hickories, living lives of semi-starvation and devastated by frequent forest-fires. There are about one hundred and forty proprietors, assessed at an aggregate sum between $200,000 and $300,000, and receiving an income to offset the fuel of a good deal less than one per cent. over the taxes. And this is being annually more than is replaced; so that the tract, for spite of its woody green foliage in summer and rainbow tints in autumn, is growing every year more desolate. Its condition, considering its proximities, is really a disgrace to Middlesex county, and Suffolk as well.

It has been proposed that the citizens of the towns within whose territory this mostly unoccupied tract lies, and others interested in forest culture, should purchase this tract and give it to the State, for the purpose of inaugurating a scientific and common-sense system of care for the trees. Should this be done, plainly, in a hundred years from now the State might be enjoying from this tract alone a revenue of $30,000 a year, while it would be a source of health and recreation quite beyond the power of money to measure.—Elizur Wright, in Massachusetts Plowman.

SUGAR FROM AMBER CANE.—The sugar-making value of the amber cane has been tested at the Faribault Refinery, Faribault, Minnesota. At the request of Governor Pillsbury, of that State, Dr. James Wilhelm, of the Refinery, has addressed a letter to his Excellency giving the more important facts concerning the experiments made, and presenting suggestions for guidance in the cultivation of amber cane. During the last season the lowest polarization of sugar was 6.5, the highest 15.6. The working average was nine per cent. The cane furnished the refinery was grown by twenty or twenty-five different farmers, and in many cases was harvested without due regard to the condition of the cane, but the sugar manufactured polarized as high as ninety-five and ninety-eight, and over six pounds to the gallon were obtained of beautiful clarified yellow sugar, with a firm, large crystal and entirely free from gum and foreign matter.

As regards the cost of production, Dr. Wilhelm says that cane can be grown about as cheaply as Indian corn. It has been proved in the vicinity of Faribault, that cane does not exhaust the soil as rapidly as wheat and corn. A gentleman in Jefferson county, Wisconsin, grew forty acres of cane during the past season at a cost of $11 per acre. Although reduced under disadvantageous circumstances it yielded one hundred and fifty gallons per acre, which would allow a net profit of $18 per acre. Dr. Wilhelm believes that Minnesota has the soil, climate and capital necessary to the development of this industry, and considers that some at least, of the one hundred millions of dollars, annually expended by this country on foreign sugars, should be spent at home.

The letter gives instructions very essential to any one who should contemplate embarking in the cultivation of the cane. The writer asserts the necessity of large refineries for successful and profitable production of sugar and syrup, as against the use of old-time and inefficient machinery, such as have been resorted to by individual cane-growers.—New York Observer.

MANURE.—Perhaps in no one item of farm practice has there been a greater change, than in that of the management of manure. Formerly it was thought that manure should only be brought to the field just as it is to be used. Now it is taken out when carting or sledding is good, and the hands and teams are not pressed with other work. By hauling it in winter, and placing it in heaps near to where it will be needed in spring, it gets the benefit of an extra turning, and, if desirable, these heaps may be again turned before they are spread. Of course some forethought must be taken to put the manure in the most convenient place for the after-labor of distributing it. Whatever else is done with manure, let it be kept in compact heaps; to scatter over the whole barn-yard that which should not only cover an area of a few square yards is wicked waste.

After the winter rains have washed out the soluble matter from the scattered manure often it runs to the nearest creek. What remains is of little value. It would be far better were the manure upon the field where its washings would be utilized. The fact has been often repeated in these columns, but our correspondence shows that it is not everywhere understood, which is—the quality of the manure depends upon the quality of the food. The animal adds nothing to what is fed to it; it takes out something, but leaves the refuse, which does not waste, but the soil does, in an available form. The old adage "out of nothing nothing comes," is commended to those who think they can make a large quantity of rich manure out of a little poor food.—American Agriculturist.

BRAHMA BOWLS.—In breeding for chickens for early market, it is important to have a breed that grows rapidly and the skin of young chickens should be yellow, and if the feathers are all white, both the chicks and old fowl will look much better when dressed than those with colored feathers. The color of the skin is important, yet half of the fowls that are sent to market have anything but a yellow skin. Small bone, short legs, and a well rounded form are also desirable, and a size, when full grown, not less than five pounds, and not over six, before dressed, gives the best early chicks for market. None of these qualities are any injury to a laying hen; and if to them are added good layers, hardy and quick, we have combined the points necessary for both meat and eggs. That it is possible to secure in one breed all of these points, there can be but little if any doubt. It is true it cannot be done in one year nor in ten, but it must be the work of many years, prosecuted with great care and perseverance, directed by high intelligence.

HOW TO FEED BRAN.—Bran or ground feed is best fed to cows upon moistened hay; it being mixed with the hay, all will be eaten together and raised and masticated. But if it is not fed dry and in a small quantity each time, for it fed alone it is not raised and remasticated, but goes on to the third and fourth stomachs. If fed in slop it is swallowed without any mastication, and mixed with little or no saliva, but if fed dry it cannot be swallowed until it is mixed with saliva, and the saliva assists in digestion. When food is masticated the act of rumination causes the saliva to flow and mix with food. We have experimented, and find that when fed alone dry ground feed is better digested than when fed wet.—National Live Stock Journal.

NORTHERN CURE FOR YELLOWS.—Professor Goessmann gives the following as a cure for yellows in peach-trees. Apply potash salts to the surface under the tree, and rake it in; then mulch with old hay, leaves, or straw. The German article in use of potash will be the best and cheapest. Use one or two pounds, according to size of tree. Apply one pound in the late fall, and the same quantity in the spring.

AN English cotemporary states the facts of the walks of a kitchen-garden at a large establishment being lined with oak shrubs instead of box, and that "it forms a dense, impenetrable shrub in the winter, and presents a neat, refreshing appearance during the summer months." Such an edging may be formed with but little labor or expense, as it is only necessary to sow the acorns at the proper time, and to stop the young plants when high enough.

PROF. WOLNY finds the following relations between temperature and the emptiness of soils: In summer, compact soil is on the average warmer than loose soil, but in winter and on a fall of temperature it is colder. In warm weather, compact soils are warmer by day and colder by night, than loose soils, and they are subject to greater fluctuations of temperature. The practical inference is plain.

HOW TO POLE.—These may be cut at any time if the snow is not too deep to get in the woods. Red cedar makes the most durable poles. When the busy spring days come you will thank your prudence and foresight if you have, during the idle days of winter, gathered your bean poles and pea brush. Put heavy weights on the latter to press them into shape.

OATS AS A MULCH FOR STRAWBERRIES.—An Ohio farmer, on account of the scarcity of mulching material, sowed three bushels of oats to an acre of berries. The oats grew about a foot high, then fell down, and proved a better and cheaper mulch than he could have obtained in any other way.

POTATOES.—A Western farmer thinks that after having cultivated over three hundred varieties of potatoes, he could recommend as the best varieties the alpha for very early, the snowflake for medium, early and Victor for late use.

THE last agricultural returns of Great Britain show that the growth of woods and forests is going on very fast, and in the last five years, has increased their area half a million acres.

Household.

DEEP SETTING OF MILK.—One of the greatest advantages of deep setting is the convenient consistence of the cream, which is removed in the best condition for the churn, being diluted with about one-half its bulk of milk. One can churn pure cream as it comes from a shallow pan, and it is always necessary to mix with it a certain proportion of milk at the skimming, to bring it to a proper state of dilution. When set in deep cans twenty inches or thereabouts in depth, good milk, such as that of a Jersey, Guernsey or Ayrshire cow, will show five or six inches of cream, so called, but if this is removed and set again in a shallow pan, one-half of it will separate as milk. Thus the cream skimmed from a deep pail is just as the right condition for churning as it is skimmed. Another advantage is economy of room. This is very important, especially when a pool or other contrivance for cold water or ice-setting is to be constructed. The dairyman will therefore, naturally incline to this mode of setting milk for cream. There are, however, some points about the use of deep cans which do not seem to be well understood, and frequent inquiries are made concerning them.

One of the most common of these inquiries is, as to the covering of the pails, or rather of the milk. A good deal of fuss has been made about the animal odor of milk, and this notion is at the bottom of most of the trouble gratuitously made in regard to the covering of the milk. If the milk house is free from dust, there is no necessity to cover the milk at all, but the milk will take no harm from close covering. The method of submerging the pails, a patented one, by the way, and not to be used without paying royalty, requires close covering, and so does the Hardin method, so called, of setting the pails in a refrigerator with ice above it, which drips upon the pails as it melts. I have tried both these methods, and modifications of them. The common plan of setting the pails in a brick-lined pool, supplied with a flowing spring, which keeps up a constant current, is convenient for all purposes, and in this case the pails may be covered with an ordinary lid, similar to that of any other tin pail.—H. S., in Country Gentleman.

BUN CRULLERS.—Rub half a pound of butter and three-quarters of a pound of sugar to a cream. Add six eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately, and flour enough to make a dough that can be conveniently handled; roll less than half an inch thick, and fry in boiling drippings. These are very nice when well made and nicely cooked, quite as much depends on the frying as on the making. I prefer beef drippings to lard, but which ever you use, be sure to have it hot enough. If you have no assistant, cut out all the dough before you begin to cook any of it, then test the fat with a small piece; if it rises immediately, put in just as many as will cover the surface, and no more. They should be a fine, bright brown when done. If the fat is not hot enough, they will soak it; if too hot, they will brown outside before they have time to rise, and burn before they are done through. Sift powdered sugar over them while still hot.

TEA TOFFEE.—Ingredients: One pound of treacle or golden syrup, one pound of moist whitey-brown or best sugar, one half pound of fresh butter. Mix the treacle and sugar well together in a large clean-lined saucepan and add the butter, broken into small pieces. Place the saucepan on a clear fire and stir slowly until all be incorporated. After this stop stirring or the toffee will "sugar;" boil about half an hour, and be careful not to let it burn. The juice of half a lemon added is a great improvement. Have a buttered tin ready to pour the toffee on, and when nearly done put a little into cold water to taste if it be done enough.

ROAST WILD DUCK.—Roast at a very brisk fire, not longer than fifteen, or at most, twenty minutes. Baste frequently with butter, and sprinkle freely with salt at the time of serving. Serve with Bigarde sauce. Pare off, as thin as possible, the yellow rind of two Seville oranges; cut it into very thin shreds, and boil them in water for five minutes. Melt a piece of butter in a saucepan, add to it a tablespoonful of flour, and stir until it begins to color; add a gill of stock, pepper and salt to taste, the juice of the oranges and a good pinch of sugar; then put in the boiled rinds, stir the sauce until it boils, and serve.

ROAST SIRLOIN OF BEEF.—Cut off most of the flap and trim the joint neatly. Have a clear, brisk fire, well built up. Place the joint close to it for the first half hour, then move it further off. Baste frequently. When nearly done sprinkle the joint well over with salt. Put a small quantity of water in the dripping-pan, then pour out the gravy, free it effectually from fat, and pour it over the joint in the dish. Time of roasting, about three hours for a ten or twelve pound sirloin. Garnish with scraped horseradish and Yorkshire pudding. Serve horseradish sauce in a tureen.

DECAYED FRUIT AND VEGETABLES.—There is no danger of overestimating the injury to health caused by the presence of partially decayed fruit and vegetables in a cellar. If any of your family show symptoms of malaria or diphtheria, overhaul the bins in your cellar at once, and throw out all diseased fruit, cabbages and turnips, heating and sprouting in heaps under your living rooms, will prove a certain source of ill health, and, in many cases, of death.

BEETS.—One of the most satisfactory ways to cook beets is to bake them; when boiled, even if their jackets are left on, a great deal of the best part of the beet is dissolved and so lost; it will, of course, take a little longer to bake than to boil them, but this is no objection; allow from fifteen to twenty minutes more for baking; slice them and heat them as you would if they were boiled. One nice way to serve them is to chop fine. After they are cooked, season with pepper, salt and butter.

STEWED SALSIFY.—Cut the root into convenient bits and throw them at once into water enough to cover them. Add salt, and stew gently until quite tender, pour off the water, add sufficient milk to cover, a good lump of butter, into which enough flour to thicken has been rubbed, season with pepper. When the butter has melted, and the milk boils, and is sufficiently thickened, serve.—American Agriculturist.

TO MAKE VINEGAR.—To make one gallon, take one pint and a half of sorghum syrup, about two tablespoonfuls of dry hop yeast, and soft water. Keep warm till it works.

Educational.

—The Belles-Lettres Society of Dickinson College, has for many years held its anniversary on the evening of Washington's Birthday, so on the twenty-second of February, it celebrated the ninety-sixth in its history in Emory Chapel of Carlisle. The chapel was tastefully decorated, and platform occupied by faculty and ministers of the town. Dr. M'Cauley introduced Mr. G. M. Clickner, of Baltimore, as anniversarian, with "Mystic Powers" for his subject. Mr. E. H. Linville, of Washington, followed with "Essentials to Success." Mr. Chas. H. Rorer, of Philadelphia, came next with "A Modern Revolution." Mr. C. E. Humrich, of Carlisle, chose for his theme, "Intellectual Culture." The last speaker was Mr. V. S. Collins, of Maryland; his topic was "Music." An orchestra composed of the students rendered agreeable airs between each discourse. Those participating in the anniversary fully maintained its established reputation of giving to the public once every year an evening's entertainment, from which both pleasure and profit are derived.

—On February twenty-second the members of the Callilogian (ladies) Society of Pennington Seminary, broke ground for their new Hall. It was a very interesting occasion. The Rev. John Wilson, A. M., delivered the address. Mrs. Baldwin, wife of the Rev. Dr. Baldwin, of China, and one of the first members of the Society, was present, and spoke. Prof. J. H. Morgan made a short address in behalf of the faculty. Congratulations were then presented from the Alpha Omega and Philomathean, the other societies of the Seminary, to the Callilogians, after which Miss Fish, of Albany, took a spade and broke the ground, amid much rejoicing. President Hanlon dismissed the assembly with prayer.

—Remodeled regulations for the elementary schools in France have just been issued. They forbid corporal punishment, and provide that the wish of the father shall always be consulted as to the participation in religious instruction; that children shall not be sent to church for catechism or service except out of class-hours; that the teacher shall not be bound to take them or watch over them there; that Sundays and Thursdays shall be holidays; and that punishments shall consist of bad marks, reprimand, partial privation of recreation, detention after school-hours, and temporary exclusion, not exceeding two days.

The Rev. Wm. E. Huntington, pastor of the Tremont street Methodist Episcopal church, Boston, has been elected a trustee of Boston University. Mr. Huntington is a nephew of Bishop Huntington, of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He is a graduate in arts of the University of Wisconsin, and in theology of the School of Theology of Boston University. He is soon to return from a year's study in Leipsic and Tuttingen.

The educational progress made by the State of Tennessee since 1872 is described as wonderful. In that year, in some of the counties, there was not a single school, either public or private. That Little Prayer Meeting.

...h hath heaven beneath the whole lump.—1 Cor. v. What a great matter a little fire kindleth.—James iii. 5.

MR. EDITOR: A protracted meeting was appointed by the preacher in charge of Attalla circuit, to embrace the first Sunday in September last, at Woodland. When the time came for holding the meeting the preacher was at home sick, as they had no preaching on Saturday, Brother Dan. McVeil held a prayer meeting. Sunday morning Bro. J. E. Rogers was present, and preached twice to the gratification of all, or nearly all present. His business was such, he had to go home, and could not return. The brethren, having made extensive preparation to hold a meeting, and having looked forward to the time with so much interest, were not easily discouraged, so they sent a runner after Bro. W. Simmons, a distance of 12 miles. By 11 o'clock Monday morning, Bro. Simmons was on hand, full of zeal and the Holy Ghost. He preached, and the power of God attended the word, and many were awakened and converted. The meeting continued until Wednesday evening with the visible results.

Fruits: Two young members, brothers Anders and Roberts, were wonderfully aroused, and being filled with the spirit left moved to start a prayer meeting. They did so. Some favored the movement, some opposed it. But they went forward with the work, the Holy Spirit directing them. They spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. The neighborhood soon became interested in the matter, and soon many began to attend the meetings. The two brethren soon began to feel that there was work for them to do, and as the part of God opened their eyes, they became more and more convinced that a revival of religion and a revival in prayer meetings and family worship was greatly needed. So they went from house to house, praying with the different families of the community and exhorting as occasion required. The fire began to spread. The fire continued to burn. The interest continued to increase until now, almost the entire community is thoroughly stirred upon the subject that it has been for years. And as Uncle Arter that is just what they boldly calls him is just in his glory. But you don't know Uncle Arter. I wish you did. Uncle Arter talks religion, talks religion, sings religion, lives it at home, at church and after everywhere he goes, and he is never to busy to go to church, or wherever duty calls him. He simply knows nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified. He don't want to know anything else. You can't teach him anything else. He had been a leader in prayer meetings for Thirty or forty years, and he never tires. God bless the poor man.

Tobacco.

Many things have been written on this subject; but we do not remember to have seen an article lately in reference to its use by clergymen.

It is a generally conceded fact that using tobacco is a bad habit. People who have no interest in religion, and very little care about morality, unite with the sneer and the saint to proclaim the habit bad. Here then is a mysterious thing, that those who profess to be preachers of righteousness and teachers and practicers of that holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" in peace, should openly practice and lastly, yea, by example, forcibly teach that which even a world, buried in sin and misery, proclaims "bad."

Do you ask "wherein is it bad?" It would be tiresome and useless, for its sinfulness all its manifold evils. We may mention these: it is filthy; it tends to paralyze the brain; it is worse than useless, consuming money which could be more profitably spent; it interferes with a man's complete dependence on Christ; or suppose we sum it all up in the terse language of the pioneer preacher, Jacob Gruber,

Tobacco is an evil weed,
A sot from the beginning did proceed.
It spoils the health and burns the clo
A vile makes a chimney of the nose.

It would be better, probably, to use the language of Dr. Adam Clarke, who, in his letter to a young preacher, speaking of preachers who do not study, says. "What is the consequence? Why, they idle away that time which is an invaluable gift of God, and either sleep away their moments or become what one justly terms the most detestable of all negatively sinful characters, useless drones." There are some, it is true, who smoke and study too; the latter they should do and leave the former undone. But these are angels in comparison with him who reads little, studies none, and is continually at the pipe.

May we not find enough in these words of the learned doctor to suggest the idea that tobacco and Christianity were not friends, but enemies? We think so, hence we speak.

How can we expect to exert a universally good influence if we continue its use? We must daily abuse our consciences, go contrary to our own judgment and that of others, lose spiritual vigor, and in a measure, our self respect, for the sake of gratifying a depraved appetite. Brethren, and especially those in the ministry, shall we continue thus, or will we, by the grace of God, conquer ourselves, and admonish others, that we may present ourselves and the children God hath given us "without spot and blameless?"

Jenny Lind at Home.

The unforgotten Swedish prima-donna lives in a spacious and charming mansion in a retired nook in South Kensington, embowered by trees and flowers. In the elegant drawing-room, hung with pictures and tastefully decorated with old china, artistic draperies, etc., I found a lady whose blue eyes and kindly smile bore me back at once over the waste of some thirty years. Again I sat my eager, excited school-girl glowing with anticipation on the verge of my first great art-delight. I saw once more before me the tall, slender figure in its white satin draperies, with green leaves and diamonds adorning the abundant fair hair, and the olden thrill creeps over me that heralded the first notes of that marvellous, that incomparable voice, whose tones were to those of the velvet-throated Patti of the silver-voiced Nilsson as the regent compared to the diamonds of a duchess. Shall I forget how old men, who knew just as much about music as they knew of Sanskrit, used to sit with the tears streaming down their cheeks while Jenny Lind was singing, "I know that my Redeemer liveth?" There she stood before me, the unforgotten idol of my girlish idolatry, changed indeed by the lapse of years, yet unmistakably the Jenny Lind of old. The abundant brown hair, with a few links of silver amid its locks, was turned under in the peculiar fashion in which she always wore it, and the eyes are lovely as ever in their expression and in their soft depths of lustrous blue. As she talked, her gloved hands lay clasped upon her knee in the easy, graceful pose that was familiar to us in the Swedish songstress long years ago.

I called her attention to the fact, and she smiled at my remembering the attitude, and the pretty German monosyllable "so!" which used to be another of the little peculiarities that was noticed and loved because they were hers, escaped from her lips. A grand piano-forte in one corner of the room, and a large three-quarter-length portrait of herself, painted at the height of her renown, recalled her past queenship in the realms of song. She was handsomely, plainly dressed in a rich black silk, closed to the throat with coral buttons, a shawl of old Clany lace was draped around her shoulders, and she wore a very simple cap of fine old Venetian guipure. She spoke in warm tones of affection of the United States, not in reference to the welcome and the worship it had accorded to her in bygone years, but because, as she said in her quaint English that had such a charm about it, "Your country takes the rabble of all other countries and gives them all a chance." I spoke of the fact that when she sang in America there were no opera-houses there. "And of that I was glad," she remarked, "for I had quitted the stage, and it was for that reason that I was anxious to go to the United States, since there I would have no temptation to return to it." I also spoke of the unique sympathetic quality of her talent, and the marvellous power that she possessed of swaying her audience at will, particularly in devotional music. Something of the old beautiful, rapt expression came into her eyes as she answered, "It was because my voice came from God and I sang to God!" Lucy H. Hooper.

Mme. Cappiani on Breathing.

Mme. Cappiani, the eminent teacher of vocalism, in an article on "Breathing," published in the Musical Record, after quoting with strong approval a recent medical writer's argument that numerous diseases of the respiratory and digestive organs are caused by breathing through the mouth, concludes: "To those teachers I have only to add my advice to singers, who have to breathe so frequently, to breathe in haste through the mouth, also every pause, while singing, to take breath.

"Take breath, with shut mouth, slowly but freely through the nose. The old Italian maestri, formerly called singing 'The School of Breathing.' I would advise singers to wear belts around the waist, or corsets, but not too tight, that the floating ribs may not be prevented from rising which gives the air-cells necessary room for free and deep inspiration. For this very reason some teachers object to corsets, but according to my experience this is an error. The corset or belt acts similar to a rudder in the water, as a counter-pressure to the diaphragm, increasing its power and constituting the direction of the air-column in the chest. If the peasants could discover another Rector, to act as a rudder resisting the current of air, traveling by balloon in any direction would be in fact accomplished.

"Through the resistance of the corset, the diaphragm, propelled by the abdominal walls, receives the power to retain the air-column in a direct line to the vocal bands, whereby greater power and intensity of sound is produced. The skill of breathing consists in the quick relaxation of the diaphragm not in pushing down and raising the ribs and chest-board, sternum, which has to remain raised till the musical phrase for one breath is finished. This expansion of the thorax gives not only a better resonance to the voice, but keeps the greater quantity of air in, while on the contrary, if the thorax is not raised, the air resting on the vocal bands escapes mostly with the first notes and the singer has a struggle for breath in finishing a phrase. The quick relaxation of the abdominal muscles by inspiration, and their propelling power, by expiration, usually called contraction, gave origin to the name of abdominal breathing." This is the only right way to use the according to nature and without effort; not pushing down, let it be well understood, and no injury whatever can arise from this method. As long as the world has stood the people of every nation have sung. Nature has given us the voice for it. David with his harp and his hymns also set the example. Correct singing, according to natural principles, has never injured any one and never will. Breathe then, as I have endeavored in this article to explain, and your will save your voice, your health and happiness."

THE COLD RIVER.—An Alpine hunter on Mount Blanc, passing the Mer de Glace, lost his hold and slipped into one of those frightful crevasses by which the ice of ice is cleft to its foundations. By catching in his swift descent against the points of rocks, and projections of ice, he broke his fall, so that he reached the bottom alive, but only to face death in a more terrible form. On either hand the icy walls rose, above which he saw only a strip of blue sky. At his feet trickled a little brook, formed from the slowly melting glacier. There was but one possible chance of escape to follow this rivulet which might lead to some passage. In silence and fear he picked his way, down, down, till his further advance was stopped by a cliff that rose up before him, while the stream rolled darkly below. He heard the roaring of the waters which seemed to wait for him. What should he do? Death was beside him and behind him. There was no time for delay. He paused but an instant, and plunged into the stream. One moment of breathless suspense a sense of darkness and coldness, and yet of swift motion, as if he were gliding through the shades below and then a light began to glimmer faintly in the waters, and the next instant he was amid the green fields and the flowers and the summer sunshine of the vale of Chamouny.

So it is when believers die. They come to the bank of the river, and it is cold and dark. Nature shrinks from the fatal plunge. Yet one chilling moment, and all fear is left behind, and the Christian is amid the fields of the paradise of God. The Belfast Flag.

The fifteenth annual meeting and banquet of the Chicago Yale Association was held in that city on the evening of December 30th. It was the largest gathering of the alumni of Yale ever seen in Chicago, nearly a hundred graduates being present. President Porter was also present and was the guest of the occasion.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

CATARRH Is a Terrible Disease. Its fearful effects—corruption running down the throat, weak eyes, deafness, loss of voice, loss of smell, disgusting odor, nasal deformities, and finally consumption. Treat it not lightly, but it is ever aggressive. Ordinary treatment—air waves—is useless. If neglected while a cure is possible it may rapidly develop into quick consumption. The most thorough, successful and pleasant treatment is Nearly all the Ills that afflict Mankind can be prevented and cured by keeping the stomach, liver and kidneys, in perfect working order. There is no medicine known that will do this as quickly and surely, without interfering with your duties as Parker's Ginger Tonic. See advertisement.

A Single Stone

from a running brook slew the giant Goliath, and millions of battle men since that time have died from a single stone in the bladder, which Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure would have dissolved and carried away.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

VICKSBURG, Miss., March 8.—At 5 P. M., to-day, a fire on the west side of Washington street, between Grove and Jackson streets, destroyed all the buildings in the block. The buildings were all frame, but two. Loss about $15,000; partly insured.

MONROE, LA., March 8.—Telegraph advices from Bastrop report the burning and total destruction of the local packet Ollie B., together with about five hundred bales of cotton, just above Point Pleasant, on the Bartholomew bayou, last night. No particulars as to the origin of the fire are given, and no lives lost. Her crew are looked for down to-night, and further particulars will be sent to-morrow.

VICKSBURG, March 9.—A fire last night on Levee street, near the Cotton Compress, destroyed one two-story frame and several other smaller buildings. This makes the third fire in the past forty-eight hours. Eleven buildings were destroyed. Loss estimated at about $20,000; insurance $5000.

AUSTIN, Texas, March 9. The bill to submit to the people a constitutional amendment, prohibiting the importation, manufacture of, and sale of intoxicating liquors in this State, except for medicinal and sacramental purposes, passed the State Senate to-day by a vote of thirty-three to seven.

HARRISBURG, Va., March 9.—The ninety-seventh session of the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, convenes here to-day. Bishop H. N. McTyeire will preside.

The Conference will consist of one hundred and seventy-seven preachers and a number of lay delegates, representing part of Baltimore city, Md., the valley of Virginia, Southwestern Virginia and portions of Western Virginia, embracing a membership of 30,387.

SHREVEPORT, La., March 10.—Reports from all sections of the country are favorable to the planting interest. Corn planting is far advanced, and cotton is being planted rapidly every day. A rain a few days since settled the dust in the city and softened the earth for cultivation.

The first engine on the New Orleans Pacific Railroad for this end arrived yesterday.

RALEIGH, N. C., March 10.—At last night's session of the North Carolina legislature, at 12:15 A. M., the House passed the Senate bill prohibiting the sale or purchase of any spirituous liquors, except wine, under heavy penalties. The act enforces total abstinence. It is to be submitted to the people for ratification in August, and if adopted by popular vote will go into effect on the first day of October.

CHICAGO, March 10.—The Wisconsin legislature to-day elected Angus Cameron, as United States Senator, to fill the unexpired term of the late Matthew H. Carpenter.

NEW YORK, March 11.—The new cable of the Mexican Telegraph Company was opened to-day, and congratulatory telegrams exchanged by President Garfield and the President of the Mexican Republic.

GALVESTON, March 11.—The News Brownsville dispatch says: "The Mexican Telegraph Company's cable, from Brownsville to Vera Cruz via Tampico, has been completed and messages exchanged."

NEW YORK, March 11.—A corps of engineers and assistants to the number of twenty-two, including physician, sailed for Vera Cruz yesterday on the City of Mexico. They are to be employed on the main line of railroad from the city of Mexico to Laredo.

WASHINGTON, March 11.—Advices received from the United States Consul General at Constantinople report the outbreak of plague near Bagdad. Particulars have been forwarded by mail.

CHICAGO, March 12.—Trains are blockaded in every direction by snow. The freight business is entirely suspended and passenger trains are all late; those nearest or three hours behind. In this city the snow was wet and heavy; only it seems to have been from four to twenty inches deep, and to have extended west into Nebraska, east into Indiana, north as far as Minnesota, and south as the Southern portion of this State.

The Northwestern, Pittsburg and Fort Wayne, and some other roads entering here have succeeded in fairly cleaning their tracks to suburban points, but are blocked most of their distance, while their connections and cross roads are utterly helpless. The snow remains piled up from four to six feet high in the streets.

At Springfield, last night, by a vote of fifty-six to fifty-one, the Illinois House defeated the constitutional amendment, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the State.

ST. LOUIS, March 13.—The steamer James Howard was destroyed by fire last night, shortly after her arrival. She burned to her guards.

WASHINGTON, March 11.—Stanley Matthews is nominated for Supreme Court Judge, Fifth District, and Orlando H. Brewster for Surveyor General of Louisiana.

FOREIGN.

PANAMA, March 2.—The situation of Lima at the present time could not be more distressing, nor the outlook for the future more gloomy, occupied by a hostile army, its exposition buildings, churches, arsenals and forts stripped of everything valuable which would pay the expenses of shipment to Chili; with no government in existence, or in the immediate prospective; its late President a fugitive, issuing from his retreat beyond Cordilleras useless edicts, proclamations, and correspondences, and maintaining the form of government without its power; the currency worthless abroad and almost destitute of purchasing power at home; provisions and all classes of merchandise excessively dear, that the marvel of day is how the poor manage to live. Such are some of the conditions of the situation in the once opulent, gay and prominent Don Los Reyes.

LONDON, March 8. The correspondent of the Times, at Berlin, comments on the great increase in emigration to the United States, and says: Whole villages are described by the local papers as migrating from Posen Prussia, Lithuania, and Schleswig.

LONDON, March 10. The West Coast Telegraph Company, limited, now controlling cables to Peru, has completed arrangements to connect with Central and South America, Mexico and the United States to Europe, saving 800 miles of transmission and about 6d per word on business between points in the United States and the west coast and South America over the route now used, which is via Brazil and Portugal.

LONDON, March 13. A dispatch from St. Petersburg says: As the Emperor was returning from parade in Michel Manege, about two o'clock Sunday afternoon, a bomb was thrown, which exploded under the Czar carriage, which was considerably damaged. The Czar alighted unhurt, but a second bomb exploded at his feet, shattering both legs below the knee, and inflicting other terrible injuries. The Czar was immediately conveyed in an unconscious state to the Winter Palace, where he died at 1:30 o'clock this afternoon. Two persons were concerned in the crime, one of whom was seized immediately. The explosion also killed an officer and two Cossacks. Many policeman and other persons were injured.

LONDON, March 13.—Reuter's St. Petersburg correspondence says the Imperial carriage was attacked on Ekatrinenlsky Canal, opposite the Imperial stables, while the Emperor was returning with the Grand Duke Michael from Michael Palace in a closed carriage, escorted by eight Cossacks. The first bomb fell near the carriage, destroying the back part of it. The Czar and his brother alighted uninjured.

The assassin, on being seized by a colonel of the police, drew a revolver, but was prevented from firing it. A second bomb was then thrown by another person, and fell close to the Czar's feet, its explosion shattering both his legs. The Czar fell, crying for help. Col. Darjibky, though himself much injured, raised the Emperor, who was conveyed to the Winter Palace in Col. Darjibky's sleigh. Large crowds assembled before the Palace, but were kept back by the troop of Cossacks. The Imperial family were all assembled at the deathbed. The Council of State was immediately convened. All places of public resort are closed.

LONDON, March 14.—The Standard's St. Petersburg correspondent telegraphs that the Czar's right leg was nearly torn from his body, and his left leg badly shattered. The Grand Duke Michael was wounded. The Czar lingered an hour and a half. It is stated that the bombs were made of thick glass, filled with nitro-glycerine. The assassins stood on opposite sides of the road. The carriage was moving fast, and the first shell struck the ground behind it, and the back of the carriage was blown out. The coachman implored the Czar to enter the carriage again, but he moved a few paces from the carriage to see to the wounded of his escort. The assassin who threw the first bomb tried to point a revolver at the Czar, but the pistol was struck from his hand.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 14. The following imperial manifesto has been promulgated:

We, by the grace of God, Alexander the Third, Emperor and Autocrat of all the Russias, Czar of Poland, Grand Duke of Finland, etc., hereby make known to all our faithful subjects, that it has pleased the Almighty, in his inscrutable will, to visit Russia with the heavy blow of fate, and to call her benefactor, the Emperor Alexander Second, to himself. He fell by the hands of impious murderers, who had repeatedly sought his precious life, and made their attempts because they saw in him a protector of Russia, the foundation of her greatness and the promoter of the welfare of the Russian people.

Let us bow to the unfathomable will of Divine Providence, and offer up to the Almighty our prayers for the repose of the pure soul of our beloved father.

We ascend the throne, which we inherit from our fathers, the throne of the Russian Empire, and Czardom and Dukedoms, inseparably connected with it. We assume the heavy burden which God has imposed upon us with firm reliance upon his almighty help.

May he bless our work to the welfare of our beloved fatherland, and may he guide our strength for the happiness of all our faithful subjects.

In repeating, before Almighty God, the sacred vow made by our father to devote, according to the testament of our forefathers, the whole of our life to care for the welfare and honor of Russia, we call upon all of our faithful subjects to unite, before the altar of the Almighty, their prayers with ours, and command them to swear fidelity to us and to our successor.

His Imperial Highness, the hereditary Grand Duke,

NICOLAI ALEXANDROVITCH,

Given at St. Petersburg, Anno Domini, 1881, in the first year of our reign.

THE TOUCH OF GRACE.

THOMAS MOORE.

Like Morning, when her early breeze
Breaks up the surface of the seas,
That dimpling o'er with light and shade
Her fickle face by turns array'd—

Thy grace can send its breathings o'er
The spirit dark and lost before,
And, freshening all its depths, prepare
For truth divine to enter there.

Till David touched his sacred lyre,
In silence lay the unbreathing wire;
But when he swept its chords along
The angels stooped to hear the song

So sleeps the soul till thou, O Lord,
Shalt deign to touch the lifeless chord;
Till, waked by thee, its breath shall rise
In music worthy of the skies.

The Missionary Resolution of the Alabama Conference.

MR. EDITOR: At the missionary anniversary of the Alabama Conference, during its recent session, a resolution was passed, of which the following is a copy from the printed minutes:

Resolved, That the preachers of the Alabama Conference pledge themselves to raise Twelve Hundred Dollars to support one missionary in the foreign field. And in order to secure this amount we agree to pay the following per cent. upon our respective salaries, viz.: 2 per cent. on salaries of $2,000 and upwards; 3 per cent., $1,500 and less than $2,000; 4 per cent., $1,000 and less than $1,500; 5 per cent., $500 and less than $1,000; 2 per cent., less than $500 per cent.

The mover of the resolution made a speech of some length in its support, after which the chairman of the Conference Board of Missions, before submitting the question, reminded the preachers that this was a step far in advance of anything previously undertaken by the Alabama Conference, and urged the brethren to vote deliberately and with a full appreciation of the fact that if the resolution should be adopted we would place ourselves under a high moral and pecuniary obligation. The question was then submitted to the vote; the response in the affirmative was prompt, hearty and full. No member of the Conference voted or spoke in the negative, or expressed then or afterwards upon the floor of the Conference, any dissent from the action taken. At the regular session of the Conference on the following day, the chairman of the Conference Board of Missions attempted to bring the resolution up, in order that it might be reaffirmed in regular session, but his motion was ruled out of order by Bishop McTyeire, on the grounds that the action of the Conference in the Missionary Anniversary was a part of regular Conference business, and its resolutions were binding upon the Conference.

This is the history of the resolution, of which Rev. H. Urquhart in the ADVOCATE of March 3, says, that it was not adopted by unanimous vote. I suppose Bro. Urquhart uses the word in such a sense as to mean that every member of the Conference was not present and voting. If such is his meaning then I suppose that in a body as large as the Alabama Conference no resolution was ever passed by unanimous vote, from the fact that one or more members will always be out of place, or from some cause will abstain from voting. But if it is proper to say of a resolution which has been proposed, explained and defended before a deliberative body, and after fair opportunity for discussion, has been passed by a full affirmative vote, without dissent, opposition or controversy, that it was unanimous, then this resolution was unanimously adopted.

I am disposed to believe that the number of those who avail themselves of the plea that the resolution was not unanimous, and thus consign it to the limbo of unfulfilled Conference resolutions, is small, and that their efforts at this late day to defeat the purpose of the Conference will end in failure.

The preachers of the Alabama Conference have at last reached the conclusion that the time has come when they must move to the front on the missionary question. Representing a membership of 31,000, who contribute but $3800 to the missionary cause, or but a fraction more than 12 cents per member, they feel that it is necessary to arouse the missionary spirit in the church, and in order to do so, they propose to set an example worthy of imitation. We have taken hold of this enterprise by the right handle. The most effective missionary sermons that will be preached this year among us, will be preached through the example of the ministers of the gospel, when from their meagre salaries they cast their contributions into the treasury of the Lord, and call upon the church to imitate their examples.

The day is past when a body of ministers, representing the numbers, the wealth, and the intelligence of Alabama Methodism, can permit the missionary spirit of the church to remain at so low a state, and be guiltless before God. To some extent we have tried the usual methods of inspiring interest in this cause, and have failed. Now we propose to make tangible proof of our devotion, and we confidently hope to see the missionary contributions of the church increased until they more nearly approximate the standard of duty and responsibility.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Facts Concerning that Conference Class.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of February 17, is a communication by Rev. F. M. Grace, on "Notes of the Alabama Conference, at Marion, December, 1881," which is quite readable and full of interest, yet not as accurate as they might have been by a little closer observation.

I hope Bro. Grace will take no exception if you allow me to furnish some facts, touching the class received at that Conference.

From the published minutes, and my close observation of this class, as well as others who have come in since my connection with the Conference, I propose to give the following statements:

Died in the work: John W. Starr, Jr., in 1853, John H. Gross in 1854, James S. Belton, March 17, 1856, in New York, Francis M. Crain, April 19 1859, Wm. A. Shegog, April 24 1861, in Texas, Walter C. Harriss, February 11, 1866, and Francis Walker, 1880, in Texas.

The last mentioned had located a year or so before his death, but he had been a regular itinerant nearly all the time.

Still in the traveling connection: Mark S. Andrews, Silas H. Cox, Lewis F. Dowdell, James M. Patton, Lafayette Patterson, in the Alabama Conference; John M. Dupree, Warren D. Nicholson, Robert Scales, in the North Alabama Conference; Joseph B. Cottrell, in the Louisville Conference; Francis M. Grace, in the Holston Conference; George W. Brown in North Mississippi Conference; James A. Peebles, in Arkansas, Ethelbert S. Smith and Wiley H. Ardis in Texas.

Of the others, John Q. Loomis, who came from the legal profession never went to the charge to which he was appointed, desisted preaching, and went back to the practice of law. Eli Hubbard, who was "college bred," an A. M., and a teacher of high standing was appointed to a professorship in the college in Summerfield, and at the end of the first year discontinued. F. G. McDonald, John Holt, and M. W. Regan, discontinued, or dropped out, at the close of the first year. M. W. Regan afterwards joined the Conference, but only remained one year. Warrington S. Wingfield, "college bred," and highly recommended when he came in, discontinued after two years' service, but subsequently reentered the Conference, and after continuing two years, "retired from the ministry."

Wm. M. Sturdevant ceased traveling at the end of three years, and is now a local preacher in Talladega county, Ala.

Alexander M. Sanford, from Emory College, Georgia, after laboring five years, located, and engaged in teaching, and finally went to Texas.

John W. Cook discontinued at the end of his second year, but the following year entered the Missouri Conference, filling important charges in that body, such as St. Charles, Danville and Mexico, but located in September, 1881.

James E. Sampey, after spending eleven years in the itinerancy, two of them in Arkansas, withdrew from the Methodist Church, and united with the Missionary Baptist Church, and is now a preacher in that denomination.

Of the thirty one in the class, two, Mark S. Andrews and Joseph B. Cottrell, have been members in the General Conference, and only these two have had conferred upon them the degree of D. D.

Six of these, Mark S. Andrews Joseph B. Cottrell, George W. Brown, Francis Walker, Ethelbert S. Smith, and Silas H. Cox, have filled the office of P. E. The two last mentioned are now incumbents of that responsible office, and S. H. Cox is now filling that position on the sixteenth year successively. Only the following have been successively in the itinerant ranks without being local a part of the time, or in the superannuated or superannuated relation, viz.: Andrews, Cox, Cottrell, Peebles, Grace, Dowdell, and Brown. Andrews, Smith, Peebles and Grace have labored as educators in the institutions under the control of the church.

The last mentioned has been for a number of years usefully identified with the educational interests of the church.

While a number have reached the highest standard, and are in the front ranks, as preachers, all, who have adhered to the traveling ministry, both among the living and the dead, have been efficient and successful dispensers of the Word of life. Some, notably among them, Grace, Cottrell, Andrews, Harriss and Smith, have been frequent as well as able and entertaining contributors to the periodicals of the church.

Two are now corresponding editors of two of the leading religious journals of the connection, J. B. Cottrell of the Central Methodist, of Kentucky, and E. A. Smith of the Texas Christian Advocate.

It can hardly be estimated how very extensive and widespread will be the influence which has gone out from those who consecrated themselves to the cause of the Master over a quarter of a century ago, as Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, and China have received their services and labors.

J. W. SMITH.

Our Advocate.

For some twenty-five years or more I have been intimately acquainted with the ADVOCATE, published for convenience in the City of New Orleans, the only organ that the Mississippi Conference has adopted as authorized to represent the interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, within its bounds. The ADVOCATE is the joint property of the Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana Conferences; it belongs to our church property. As members of the Mississippi Conference, we have promised to try and place a copy in every Methodist family within our respective charges.

Since our last Conference session I have been trying to help the brethren redeem our pledge. I find our pastors at every point burdened with many cares, trying to be abundant in labors, and cheerfully enduring many inconveniences and hardships for Christ's sake. All are keenly alive to the importance of securing the co-operation of the weekly visits of our ADVOCATE, and have bid me God-speed—contributing their time, hospitality, pulpits and knowledge of local matters. I have had a continuous love feast and an ADVOCATE class meeting. I never knew before how essential our paper is to the real happiness of the people. Dr. Parker's editorials are as manna to the spiritually minded. If he could have heard only a part of the voluntary testimonies given me, he would never feel like growing weary in writing and praying to God to bless his editorial work to the comfort of souls. Eternity only will be able to reveal the good that results from his weekly pleadings to wield only a sanctified pen. Then this year our paper has a corps of associate editors and contributors that place it the peer of any religious paper in our church.

One on our eastern border I found a prominent gentleman in the law and church, who had some fifteen or twenty papers coming to his home. Our ADVOCATE was no stranger at his home, but the time of renewal came last year, oversight to renew at the time caused the ADVOCATE to cease its visits. There was a void created which all other papers failed to supply. I met a hearty welcome; money, the wires will tell two dollars, and even before the first message had come, the brother confessed that he had now a good conscience, by saying, "Bro. Bowden, to tell you the truth, the ADVOCATE is the only paper that comes to our house that nearly every thing is read in it, and is read by everybody."

I thanked God, and felt happy.

R. R. BOWDEN.

Our Delegates to the Ecumenical.

The late session of the Mississippi Conference passed unanimously the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in each pastoral charge a collection shall be taken during the months of April and May, to defray the expenses of our delegates appointed by the Bishops to the Ecumenical Congress, to be held in City road chapel, London, in the month of September, 1881, which amounts shall be forwarded to Rev. C. G. Andrews, D. D., Jackson, La."

Other Conferences have passed similar resolutions, and are displaying commendable pride in making adequate provision for their delegates. This is right and praiseworthy. As the voluntary offerings of their brethren, and an expression of cordial sympathy with the great Ecumenical movement, it will be very gratifying to our representatives. Besides, the trip is expensive, and will compel a larger outlay than should be expected or permitted. They go, not to represent private interests, but the church. To go at their own charges will cause embarrassment. Some, probably, will have to forego attendance. This is only to remind our Mississippi brethren of an obligation they cordially assumed, and will be pleased to meet.

C. H. G.

Baltimore Conference M. E. Church, South.

This body met at Harrisonburg, Wednesday, March 9. Dr. A. W. Wilson, in the absence of the Bishop was elected president. Bishop McTyeire presided after the first days' session. We have the proceedings of the first four days, and the appointments. We give the following items from the Richmond Christian Advocate and the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist:

The Baltimore district was called, and represented by the Presiding Elder, Rev. Samuel Rogers, D. D., as follows: The almost unprecedented severity of the winter has proved to be a serious hindrance in the work of the year, especially upon circuits. Notwithstanding this, it is believed that the statistics will show a numerical gain in the number of members, and no falling off in payments for ministerial support and Conference collections. There is steady increase of interest in Sunday-school work, and gains both in the number of schools and the number of scholars on roll. Family worship is observed by a minority of our people. There is a growing interest in mission work, and efforts to pay indebtedness on church property have been crowned with such success that nearly all debts have been extinguished. The condition of the district may be reported generally prosperous.

The East Baltimore district was represented by Rev. Presbling Elder Armstrong, who said the district suffered not only by reason of the inclement winter, but also from the prevalence of sickness during the summer. Notwithstanding the spiritual and material interests of the church in the district have not been seriously depressed. A net increase of membership will appear; a new church has been built and paid for at Sullersville, Queen Anne's county, Md., and another completed at Huntingdon, Calvert county, Md., and also paid for. A new parsonage, built on Tyler's circuit, Trinity station, in Baltimore, has raised upwards of $11,000 during the year, paying the debt on the church property and increasing the benevolent contributions.

The report of Rev. Thos. E. Carson, Presiding Elder of the Roanoke district, is as follows: This district is located in the upper part of the Valley of Virginia, extending from twenty miles beyond Staunton to Christiansburg, covering something over six counties. It has in it sixteen pastoral charges and a membership of about 3,000. This district has been steadily improving for some years past in all churchly and temporal respects. Members have increased in the larger number of the churches, whilst financially, very excellent progress is everywhere apparent.

In the Moorefield district, Rev. Ramsey Smithson, Presiding Elder, there were four hundred conversions the past year; the spiritual condition good; the Sunday school interest on the increase; several dedicated during the year. There is a district parsonage at Romney in process of erection. The preachers have been faithful and efficient in the performance of their work, and the district, in its general interests, is in a healthy and hopeful condition.

The Lewisburg district of the Baltimore Conference has been presided over for the last two years by the Rev. J. C. Dice, well known throughout the bounds of the Baltimore Conference as an earnest and able minister and a courteous Christian gentleman. The district is in a very prosperous condition. There have been extensive revivals in several charges of the district. The number of accessions to the church reach up into the hundreds.

The Winchester district has been under a tidal wave of prosperity for the past several years, evidenced thereby the wise and faithful administration of both Presiding Elder and pastors. The reports at the present session of the Conference will show a decided increase in every church interest. This is particularly true of Berryville circuit which has risen within the past several years from a mission to one of the most desirable self-sustaining charges in the Conference. There have been over 300 conversions in the past two years, and the financial interest has also proved in the same ratio. In surveying the district we may well say, "See what God hath wrought."

B. W. Waters, of the Baltimore district, James Edgar Wilson, Frank T. Griffith and John Miller, of the East Baltimore district, John Wesley Mitchel, of the Roanoke district, S. V. Hildebrand, of the Moorefield district, and Wm. G. Hodgkin, of the Washington district, were recommended by the committee as having passed the requisite examination, and were admitted on probation into the traveling connection. After the character and qualification of these young men had, as is the custom in Annual Conference, been carefully inquired into, Bishop McTyeire asked, "Are they all single men?" and when answered in the affirmative, he said, "I hope you will try and keep them so for a reasonable time" and, reminded the Bishop, "while our preachers marry, and marry, well, if any of these young men have taken any preliminary steps in that direction, I advise them to postpone future proceedings for awhile."

Finances.—Bishops' Fund, Assessed $1,163; Collected $1,113.

Good Words.

Southey, has, in one of his poems, a suggestive image, appropriate to youth and age equally:

"And as when all the summer trees are seen
So bright and green,
The holly leaves a sober hue display,
Less bright than they;
But when the bare and wintry woods we see,
What then so cheerful as the holly tree?

So serious should my youth appear among
The thoughtless throng,
So would I seem among the young and gay
More grave than they,
That in my age as cheerful I might be
As the green winter of the holly tree."

"One Niagara is enough for the continent or the world, while the same world requires thousands and tens of thousands of silver fountains and gently flowing rivulets, that water every farm and meadow and every garden, and that shall flow on every night with their gentle, quiet beauty." So with the acts of our lives. It is not by great deeds like those of the martyrs that good is to be done; it is by the daily and quiet virtues of life, the Christian temper, the good qualities of relatives and friends, and all that it is to be dutiful. Albert Barnes.

There will be works with faith, as there is thunder with lightning, but just as it is not the thunder but the lightning, the lightning without the thunder, that strikes the tree, so it is not the works which justify. Put in one sentence, faith alone justifies, but not the faith which is alone. Lightning alone strikes, but not the lightning which is alone without thunder, for that is only summer lightning, and harmless. J. W. Robertson.

Christ is Alpha and Omega in the great world; endeavor to make him so in the little world; practise to make him thy last thought at night when thou sleepest, and thy first thought in the morning when thou awakest; so shall thy sleep be sanctified in the night, and thy understanding rectified in the day; so shall thy rest be peaceful, thy labors prosperous, thy life pious, and thy death glorious. Francis Quarles.

It is a high sedeem; almost awful thought for every individual man, that his earthly influence, which has a commencement, will never, through all ages, have an end. The life of every man is as the well-spring of a stream, whose small beginnings are indeed plain to all, but whose course and destination, as all winds through the expanses of infinite years, only the Omniscient can discern. Carlyle.

Reason is a fine thing, but let us not think too much of it. God does not. We know as surely we know on the authority of his Word that all the proud and high things of man's intellect are infinitely less valuable in his sight than the humblest aspiration after mercy and truth, than the heart-uttered groan of a contrite spirit.—Kitto.

Old age brings us to know the value of the blessings which we have enjoyed, and it brings us also to a very thankful perception of those which yet remain. Is a man advanced in life? The ease of a single day; the rest of a single night, are gifts which may be subjects of gratitude to God.—Paley.

Do you feel you are weak? This is the Spirit's bidding you to go to God for strength. The greater your wants, the greater your encouragement to go to God for supply; for the greater will be his glory in supplying them: he says, "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it."

If any speak ill of thee, flee home to thine own conscience, and examine thine heart; if thou be guilty, it is a just correction; if not guilty, it is a fair instruction; make use of both; so shalt thou distil honey out of gall, and out of an open enemy a secret friend.—Quarles.

Who can deservedly be called a conqueror? He who conquers his rancorous passions, and endeavors to turn his enemy into a friend. Thou shalt not say, "I will love the wise, but the unwise I will hate;" but thou shalt love all mankind.—Hebrew Talmud.

Blessed is the man who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. Know thy work, and do it; and work at it like Hercules. One monster there is in the world, the idle man.—Carlyle.

The humble man, though surrounded with the scorn and reproach of the world, is still in peace, for the stability of his peace resteth not upon the world, but upon God.—Thomas a Kempis.

Enjoy the blessings of this day if God sends them; and the evils bear patiently. For this day only is ours; we are dead to yesterday, and we are not born to to-morrow.

If the Lord careth for thee, be thyself at rest; for if he care, why shouldst thou care too? His providence will provide if thou sincerely trust it.—Leighton.

What a folly to dread the thought of throwing away life at once, and yet have no regard to throwing it away by parcels and piecemeal.—John Howe.

What can be a stronger motive to a true trust and reliance on the mercies of our Maker, than the giving us his Son to suffer for us.—Addison.

THE TRUE CHURCH.

In the wilderness I search'd the land,
Among the Fifth with its chapel stood,
In the heart of a green and shady wood;
Its lovers and saints, there all day long,
And sometimes with the angels sang.
They were part of the earth's scarce sweet
For the holy incense that chapel meet,
For the sins less blind to the blind.

HEAVEN.

DR. MUHLENBERG.

Since e'er thy footstool, here below,
Such radiant gems are strewed,
O! what magnificence must glow,
My God! about thy throne!
So brilliant here these drops of light
There the full ocean rolls, how bright!

If night's blue curtain of the sky,
With thousand stars inwrought,
Hung like a royal canopy,
With glittering diamonds fraught
Be, Lord, thy temple's outer veil,
What splendor at the shrine must dwell!

The dazzling sun at noon-tide hour,
Earth from his flaming vase,
Flinging o'er earth the golden shower,
Till vale and mountain blaze
But shows, O Lord! one beam of thine
What, then, the day where thou dost shine!

Ah! how shall these dim eyes endure
That noon of living rays?
How my spirit, so impure,
Upon thy glory gaze?
Avaunt, O Lord, anoint my sight,
Arrobe me for that world of light.

Our Pulpit.

Vision Seekers.

[THE FOLLOWING SERMON WAS DELIVERED IN THE CHURCH OF THE STRANGERS, NEW YORK, YESTERDAY MORNING. OUR STENOGRAPHIC REPORTER WAS PRESENT AND TOOK IT DOWN IN SHORT-HAND.]

"Your young men shall see visions."—JOEL 2, 28.

It is not an uncommon thing to hear men of narrow intellects and great vital energy disparage those who are called "visionaries," while it is the fashion to laud the "practical."

A man who has a talent for working a treadmill is tickled by being told that he is "practical." He congratulates himself that he is attempting no impracticable thing. He is struggling up no heights of fancy; not he. He thinks that the silliest youth of whom he ever heard is that young person in Longfellow's poem who bore a flag with the strange device of "Excelsior," and went climbing up the snow and ice therewith, fool-hardily beginning his journey in the afternoon.

If that young visionary had been a practical person, he would have heeded the warning of that old man and of the peasant, and instead of going on with clear standing in his bright blue eye, he would have turned in at the door of the maiden, especially if the maiden's father had had a store of wood and fire in the chalet. But that Alpine youth was not practical. The monks of St. Bernard were and none of them ever perished in the snow. But they did find this impractical youth half buried in the drift of the avalanche, lifeless but beautiful.

"There," says our practical friend, "what's the use of being beautiful if you are lifeless?"

And as to the meaning of the last three lines of the poem, about a voice falling from the sky "serene and far," our practical friend gives it all up. He does not even ask the solution of the conundrum which it involves.

Now, the real fact is that one "vision," may, in the highest meaning of the phrase, is worth a dozen "practical" men, and for the simple reason that there would be no practical men if there were no visionaries, as there would be no profitable activity without high thought. The whole race of practical men and they are never to be disparaged, is to make real, in every-day life what the visionary men have first seen with their spiritual eyes.

The visionary is he who, before a foot of rail is laid, sees a railway reaching from New York to San Francisco, over river and bay and lake and prairie and mountain and canon. The practical men are the laborers who blast the rocks, and bring dirt in the carts and wheelbarrows to make the grade, and construct the road.

The visionary is the engineer who searches up and down a river, and at last detects the precise spot where a bridge should span the stream, and who, at the same moment, sees every block of stone which is to go into the abutments, and every piece of timber or of steel which is to make the strings, the thwarts, the chesses, and the couplings. The practical man is the mason, or the carpenter, or the laborer, who makes that vision a real strong, safe passage-way for loaded wagons or the tidering trains.

Without these necessary practical men there would be no bridge over the river; but without the indispensable visionary there would be no bridge anywhere, and no kind of employment for practical men, who must stand holding on to their most valuable powers until the visionaries suddenly say: Put such a cottage there, and such a palace there, and such a church there, and such a house there, and such a bridge there, and such a tunnel under Mont Cenis, and such a telegraphic cable under the ocean. At the command of the visionaries the practical men find something to do, and they do it. "Your young men shall see visions," said the prophet, in one of the grandest passages in literature.

Blessed are the seers! We owe them everything. It was a seer of visions who beheld the people of Israel led out from the house of bondage into the land where Jehovah had promised unto Abraham. The seer of that vision, Moses, would never have been able to endure the prodigious strain which came upon him when he had to carry all that people forty years about in the Sinaitic desert and organize a nationality which should revolutionize the ancient world of thought and action.

It was a seer of visions who heard, near the gates of Damascus, that Jesus who vouchsafed him such a vision of glory as enabled the young pupil of Gamaliel to organize forces which should revolutionize the modern world of thought and action. It was a seer of visions who went forth from his cell in the Erfurth monastery to begin the Herculean task of cleansing the former Augean stables of medieval Rome.

It was a seer of visions who, standing on the eastern shore of Europe, gazed over the waters toward the west, and beheld a great land stretching where practical men saw only a waste of waters. America lay large and fair in the eyes of Columbus, alluring and attracting him long, before his vessels beached themselves upon its unknown coast. The world had gone on without this addition of America but for that vision in some man's eyes, if not in the eyes of Columbus.

It was one seer of visions who beheld printed sheets before a type was made. It was another who saw boats and carriages propelled at rapid rates before any steam-engine had been constructed. It was another who saw telegrams outflying the winds before the click of an instrument had been heard in the land. It was a seer of visions whose eye ran up and down from end to end of an ocean telegraph, and whose ear heard the nations whispering to each other, and kissing each other. These, these thousand miles of ocean long before a strand of the cable had been formed. And in art as in science, literature, government, trade, and religion, it is the visionaries who pioneer the way for the practical men, and draw their heavier brothers forward by the songs they sing far up great heights and far away beyond great mountain ranges.

The Good Father knows, and only he, how much practical repentance, faith, self-denial, and grand, godly living have been created in hut and palace by the vision which John Bunyan saw in Bedford Jail. Since Jesus ascended no history of actual personal or national transactions has had a hundredth part the influence which has been exerted on mankind by the simple narrative of the English tinker's vision of "Pilgrim's Progress."

Bunyan has done more for the world than Thucydides and Herodotus, than Tacitus and Livy, than Gibbon and Hume, than Rollin and Thiers, than Niebuhr and Dahlmann, than Prescott and Bancroft, and than all of them put together. For true religion that Dreamer has done more than any dozen "practical" preachers who have lived since his day. He enlarged the possibilities of practical preaching.

The general fact is that it is the men that see visions who make possible the existence of the work of the men who do deeds; and when "practical men" disparage "visionaries," and when our current speech compels our lexicographers to define "visionary" as "one whose imagination is disturbed," and "one who forms impracticable schemes," it is simply another instance of the clay criticising the potter. In every such case, so much the worse for the clay.

It is because works of faith must precede works of righteousness that I would have the young men of America put themselves in such a posture toward the Holy Spirit of God that he may pour upon them the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy: "Your young men shall see visions."

Think what a state of affairs would follow if all the Christian young men of the land went about, day and night, with theories of the greatest and widest possible activities. What would they see by day and dream by night? They would see strong young men growing up into the most radiant manhood, in wharf, in counting house, and bank, in ship and store, in drawing-rooms and on railways, doing everything as unto the Lord; men not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord; men valiant for the truth on the earth; men whose sweetness did not impair their strength, and whose strength did not sour their sweetness; men who made all they could, and saved all they could, and gave all they could; men constantly trampling under foot the fanatical doctrine that they were made good unless their hearts tell them to do it; men whose work was a real worship, and whose prayers gave them power to work; men on fire to love toward God and man, and kindling into holy flame every soul they touched; men ready to live and ready to die.

They would see these men in companies, in companies, in associations, in multitudes, in masses, prophesying, that is, finding grander things in the Word of God and in the heart of man, and proclaiming these discoveries. They would see the breathlessness with which other men would hang upon the words of these simple-hearted speakers, taking knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus, until the visions of God drew the eyes of the listeners from the pictures of sin, and they began to see the glory of God shining in the face of Jesus.

The practical thing for Christians to do, is to engage in earnest prayer, that we may see fulfilled that which the Lord spake by the mouth of his prophet Joel: "I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions."

Things New and Old, Out of the Treasury.

Bethel's vision is Nathaniel's promise; both the vision and the promise are the experience of the least in the kingdom of heaven, at this day. The promise so beautifully typified to Jacob by the ladder whose abutting length was trod by ascending and descending angels, is the stone which was guaranteed to Nathaniel, and is fully realized in the completed scheme of grace by us to-day. The promise symbolized in that vision, of such exceeding beauty and sentiment that it awoke a hope in every breast that it might be more than a dream, was that of a versed sing closed by one man is again to be thrown open, and intercourse between heaven and earth re-established through one man by means of ascending and descending angels.

Notice, the old order of intercourse is reversed. Before sin interfered, that order was, God talking with man, man answering, ascending, descending, as angels was, the order; but in the vision the order is changed, the promise is according to the vision, ascending and descending man talks with God, God answers, a more blessed intercourse.

Behold the vision: A ladder whose foot rests at the head of sleeping Jacob, and stretching away through the stars to the sills of heaven's open gates, its rungs from bottom to top trod by ascending and descending angels, God standing in the open gates, hearing Jacob's ascending angels and dispatching his answers by descending angels back to Jacob and these answers are great promises. "I am the Lord the God of thy father Abraham. . . . In thee and shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. I am with thee and will keep thee whither thou goest."

What is the meaning of this vision?

1. It shows us that heaven's attention is held by one man. The ladder is let down to him, and angels, messengers; messages, prayers ascend from him, and angels, messengers, answers descend to him. God is talking to him, answering him. A spectacle! Heaven's attention concentrated on one man. What a splendid symbol of intercourse between heaven and earth, a reconciled friendly intercourse.

2. But it is a promise of more than intercourse; it is also a promise of an intercourse of blessings to all nations through one man, that man Jacob. It is a symbolic promise of the one Mediator between God and men, the one man Christ Jesus, the promised Saviour.

3. This vision was partly fulfilled in Jacob's history. For ages by Israel's altars only could God be acceptably approached. To his temple only came the Holy Spirit, to his altars only the fire descended.

To Israel only was committed the living oracles, through him alone did God reveal his will and thus the promise was kept, through Jacob all the nations were blessed. The blessings of the gospel were deposited in Israel's history.

4. But to-day the promise is fulfilled. Behold it. One arm set up by our ascended Lord, one arm dropped from heaven by our descending Lord, when he laid aside his crown and took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh; every ring a strong promise of a coming, suffering and triumphant Saviour. It is crowded with angels. Those descending are heaven-born angels, the answers to faithful prayers, but the ascending are heaven-born, too, they are the prayers of faith, a faith inspired of Christ, its author and finisher.

Oh! there are angels coming now to bring the answers of a thousand prayers, there are angels speeding heavenward. Oh, keep the way crowded with angels, this earth has no place where a Bethel may not be reared.

MISSIONARY.

—"The Church Known of the Church at our Lord Jesus Christ in Japan," or the "Mobile Assembly," representing the missions of the U. P. Church of Scotland, the Reformed Church in America, and the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, has presented another annual report of its operations, the fourth since the union took place. The combined force of the missions consists of 10 ordained missionaries, 12 of whom are connected with the American societies; physicians and teachers, besides, 12 ordained native ministers, 9 native licentiates, and 12 unlicensed native helpers and students. There are 7 organized churches and 71 preaching places and stations, besides those in day and Sunday-schools. The number in adults in full communion is 1,295, a gain in 1880 of 72. There are besides 125 baptized infants, making the total on the roll 1,411, against 1,339 in the previous year. The contributions of the churches increased from 1,761 yen in 1879 to 2,700 yen, about $2,000, in 1880. 12 of the churches are in the city of Tokio; has 6 a number of preaching places and Sunday-schools. The churches are well situated and have good congregations. In Yokohama there are two churches, and north of Tokio six. The latter are entirely under the care of native evangelists and helpers. "The subject of self-support," says the report, "has received the earnest and prayerful attention of the Council during the year. A plan embracing the following points has been matured: 1. The systematic and proportionate assumption of a part of the expenses of each church by the church itself from the time of its organization; 2. The constant diminution of help from mission funds as the churches increase in size. 3. The cessation of all help after a certain moderate growth has been attained." The report further says that "the control of Dun Kuwai is passing more and more completely into the hands of the native pastors and elders. On the whole, the native members manifest a good degree of ability in the conduct of business and a clear comprehension of the needs of the church and of the methods best fitted to promote the advancement of the cause of Christ." As to the success of the union of the three missions, the Council speaks with decision: "All of the results have been good. Difficulties have, indeed, arisen; but only such as are incident to every form of activity, and these have in no case been caused by the union of the missions. On the contrary, the union has, we believe, promoted harmony, between the missions, the efficiency of the work and the glory of the Great Head of the Church." The sales of portions of New Testament have greatly increased since the translation was completed, and the circulation of tracts was larger than ever before. Among the events of the year thought worthy of mention was the holding of an open-air meeting at the Ueno Park, Tokio, with a large staff of foreign speakers, and thousands of hearers. No opposition was shown by the Government, which is believed to favor tacitly all proper methods of Christian evangelism.—New York Independent.

—The congregation in Aneityum, one of the New Hebrides, raised 5 pounds of arrowroot for the foreign mission fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada the past year. This seems like a small contribution, writes the mission ary, the Rev. Joseph Annand, for a large congregation; but it is quite liberal in comparison with the gifts of the heathen of the islands to their objects of worship. He once attended a feast at one of the villages of Efate. Many pigs lay bound at the place, and there were large quantities of yams, tomatoes, and sugar cane. Before any of this food could be eaten an offering must be made to the spirits. Mr. Annand expected to see a pig or two sacrificed, at the least; but the sacred man simply cut off the tips of the tails of the pigs, and threw them into the bushes, for the spirits to live on. The arrow-ro, sells for about a shilling a pound in the colonies; but more is received for it in England. Mr. Annand says the greatest difficulty in the way of advancement in civilization and social comforts is the content of the old people with their old mode of life. Knowledge, cleanliness, and good food they care little for. Politics and trade are almost entirely unknown. The people are not concerned with what goes on in the world, and their thoughts lies in a very narrow compass.—New York Independent.

—The missionary expedition of the Board to Bihe, Central Africa, arrived at Benguela, Nov. 13. Mr. Bagster writes very favorably of the present healthfulness of Benguela, of the bearing of the Portuguese officials, and of the accounts he has received of Bihe. The governor is to give them a letter to the king of Bihe, whom he hoped to see by the end of January, though he had been told he would have to wait three months for porters. Of the Bihéans he heard glowing accounts. They are strong and lusty and live in a climate where no quinine is needed. He was very anxious to leave Benguela before heavy Spring rains come on, when the roads can be had from Bihe with the coast monthly.

—President Angell, the Commissioner recently sent to China to negotiate the new treaty, was impressed with the work of English and American missionaries in and near Pekin, and with the unity that prevails among them. "They are working," he says, "under many discouragements with a patience and devotion which are Christlike, and are reaping more fruits than I had expected to find."

—Dr. Somerville, the veteran Scotch evangelist, has gone on a mission to Germany. At Elberfeld, where he preached to a congregation of 1,100 people, he received two threatening letters ordering him to leave the town at once, or he would have a bullet put through him." The threat was repeated, but he stayed and preached to a larger audience and was altogether unharmed.

—There has been a wide distribution of portions of Scripture and religious books among the thousands of visitors to the Brussel Exposition. On one Sabbath 5,000 Dutch and 13,000 French books were distributed. Religious services in the Gospel tent have been largely attended, and the Gospel has been preached in Flemish, Dutch and French.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—A letter from a Protestant in Belgium states that the slumbering war between Liberals and Catholics will soon break out afresh. Two questions are before the Chamber: "The reduction of the bishops' salaries and the inspection of convents, which the Liberal majority appeared determined to vote, so soon as the government shall take the initiative by bringing forward the two bills. While awaiting this battle, the Liberals have opened their histore with the schools question, as under the consideration of the parliamentary commission. The constitution of that commission is not satisfactory, nor its proceedings free from partiality or suspicion. It has, nevertheless, served to make known some curious details of the action of the clergy and their friends in favor of what they style instruction according to God. Some of the facts disclosed are hardly credible concerning the pressure and intimidation brought to bear upon the liberty of fathers of families, with a view of emptying the schools. The priests pursue their efforts to the bed of death. Take, for example, the case of one poor man, who on the very agonies of dissolution was urged to promise before witnesses, to withdraw his children from the communal school, on pain of being refused absolution."—New York Independent.

—The church of the United Brethren in Christ, which has hitherto neglected to appoint representatives to the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, "not from any lack of fraternal feeling," but because it does not consider itself a distinctively Methodist body, will doubtless be represented in the London Conference after all. An informal council of members of that church, in which Bishop Weaver participated, has resolved to present the subject to their General Conference, which meets in May, on the understanding that there are six vacant places into which their delegates will be welcomed. They say they do not want their church to be regarded as so anomalous as not to admit of classification, and they believe that its proper place is in a Council of Arminian Churches.

—The Island of Jersey, which lies close to the French coast, is just now high in the tax of the Jesuits. A large number of that order have settled on it and purchased valuable properties. Other fraternities, anticipating expulsion, are also securing property. The Trappists are talking of buying Herm, one of the Channel Islands, where they would be more secluded. The Jesuits have opened no places in Jersey for the instruction of the youth of French families, for the reason that, under advice, they desire to do nothing that would tend to wound the susceptibilities of the inhabitants, by whom the order is not regarded with particular favor, and is carefully watched, lest any open attempts should be made to proselytize.—New York Independent.

—The London Methodist says: "Mr. John Ryle, the grandfather of the Bishop of Liverpool, was a church Methodist in Macclesfield, and a friend of John Wesley. He was the means of the building of Sunderland Street Chapel. Many years ago the trustees of this chapel placed a tablet in the chapel to Mr. Ryle's memory. At the request and expense of his grandson, Bishop Ryle, this tablet has recently been restored, and the following addition has been made to it: 'This tablet was cleansed and renovated in the year 1881 by John Charles Ryle, D. D., first Bishop of Liverpool, in token of his deep respect for the memory of his grandfather and for memory of his grandfather's friend, John Wesley.'"

—The Bombay Guardian says: "There was a meeting of the congregations connected with the M. E. Church in Bombay, on Monday last, at the Great Road Church, to take leave of the late pastor and wife, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Row. Judges Morris, Esqs. presided, and remarks were made by several gentlemen. A display for Rs. 50, subscribed by the members of the church as a token of their thankfulness to God for the labors of his servant, was presented to Mr. Row, and prayer was offered for the blessing of God upon his future work, as well as upon that of his successor in Bombay, Rev. Mr. Jacobs."

—The recent statistics of the Wesleyan Methodists give a summary of 22,527 members with 10,880 on probation. They support 419 missionaries, and have raised for this purpose this last year about $500,000. They raised for theological schools about $50,000, and for Home Missions and other purposes $3,000,000 more. They have 6,676 Sunday-schools in Great Britian alone, with 787,183 scholars. They show much zeal and enterprise in all their work, and much success has attended their labors in the past.

—At the annual meeting of the American Tract Society, in New York City, on Feb. 21, addresses were made by Justice Strong and Representative Haskell, the latter giving the result of his personal observations as to usefulness of colportage on the frontier. The aggregate receipts for the year, including balance brought forward, is $382,283; $879,121 donations and legacies. Expenditures, $378,882.

—In Georgia there is a colored preacher of the Baptist persuasion who ministers to three congregations, and in all has 2,800 members. He has a salary of $1,200, owns a farm, and drives a good horse. He had formerly peculiar views of discipline, for when any of his members went astray he took with him two or three deacons to hold him and himself inflicted personal chastisement.

YOUNG MARCH WIND.

A jolly fellow is old March Wind
With all his bluster and noise,
Though he has no thought for the old and poor,
He's a thorough friend of the boys.
He joins their play with a right good will,
Aha, the vane see him go,
With a hi, hi, hi, far up in the sky
While the boys stand gazing below.

Oh, a noisy fellow is young March Wind,
And almost any day
You may see him up in the highest trees,
Blowing his trumpet in play.
Over the house high and low
He blows with all his might
Oh, dear Mr. Wind, would you be so kind
As to go nestern at night.

The Adventures of a Mouse.

We are much obliged to our little friend, Annie Dyer, aged ten years, for the following excellent story:

"We once lived in a tiny old garret which no one disturbed, and were tucked snugly away in a corner of its bits of soft carpet. We used to have a good many neighbors, but one by one they went off on exploring expeditions, and we have never heard of them since, they never returned; and whether they were killed or found better houses, I do not know. My wise old mother suspected they had fallen into some trap, or been devoured by huge monsters known as Tomcats, of which there was quite a number on the premises, and had often cautioned us never to venture beyond the garret door. But as the weeks passed by, and all was so quiet in our little home, I could not believe anything would befall me if I crept softly down the stairs, and took a peep into the other parts of the house. So one bright afternoon everything seemed to favor my adventure. Mother was asleep, all was as still as death about the house, and out I stole as first, of course, very cautiously, trembling even at the sound of my own breath. But as nothing disturbed me, no traps, or cats, anywhere to be seen, I grew bolder, and ran from room to room as if I were perfectly at home, thinking to myself how foolish my dear mamma had been never to see anything of the beautiful home we lived in, and knew so little of from our plain little corner in the garret. However, the object of my trip this afternoon was to visit the pantry, as I had grown very tired of our plain home fare.

"Oh, how my mouth watered at the thoughts of feasting on cheese, doughnuts, blackberry jam, and all such tempting dishes that I had so long been denied.

"At last after going down several flights of stairs I came to a little door with a square cut in one corner. What could it mean? surely the opening was not made for my benefit, for it it had been ten times my size it then would have been larger than was necessary. Surely this was the pantry and very possibly old Tomcat was on the other side, waiting to grab me. Gradually it was one of those traps. Though for a moment, what shall I do, must I return to the garret just as I have gained the very threshold of the long wished-for pantry? No, it was impossible.

I peeped in, then waited, peeped again, and I was satisfied that no traps or cat waited to devour me, and with one bound was on the other side.

"Will I ever forget the rows of preserve jars, great square tin boxes of crackers, doughnuts and innumerable other cans and boxes of good things I suppose, as they were too securely fastened for me to satisfy my curiosity?

"But to my delight there sat the cheese uncovered, and I feasted to my heart's content. At last when trouble of no more I began to think of the long journey before me and how I should ever get home.

"Going back as quietly and downstairs as I could, I had just gained the second flight of stairs, when, in crossing the hall where he came from I will never know. I felt myself seized by a large pair of claws. Oh, the agony of that moment, can I ever forget it? All the sins of my life and especially the great disobedience of that afternoon came vividly before me and I felt that I would give all the cheese in the world, and live on bread and water the rest of my days to be once more in the quiet old garret.

"But no such good fortune was mine, and I was destined, as I thought, to be torn to pieces in the jaws of this terrible monster. He tormented me unmercifully, would almost be an escape, and then with a plunge grab me again, uttering a dreadful growl and showing all his teeth, making me thank that every moment was my last. Finally, growing weary of his sport, he lay down in the bright sunshine on one of the children's fur tippets and indulged himself in a sound nap. There I lay scarcely daring to breathe and unable to move, so tightly was I held in the clinches of this terrible monster, and while he dozed and snored, I thought if I could only be relieved how good and obedient I would be. I would never, never disobey my mother's word again, nor would I deny her in everything. I had lain here for ages, it seemed to me, indulging in these remorseful thoughts, watching for a chance to make my escape when trimidine came in. Dear me, she exclaimed it does seem to me that I will never teach those children order. Here is Mary's tippet lying on the floor, with pussy asleep on it, and as she jerked it up from under the hideous monster he was thrown and startled so that he let go his hold on me. In a moment I was on the floor at their feet and you may rest assured I made good use of mine for once. But I had not only old Tom to face but Grandma now to dodge, also, for spying me she at once cried I thought we had gotten rid of these troublesome mice, and seizing the poker made for the door just as I was clearing it. I never paused to look behind, but flew until I had reached the garret door, and there trembling in every limb and out of breath, was welcomed by my poor mother with tears of joy. I made many promises that I would never again venture out of the garret, and I think I can truthfully say that I never, from that time, have disobeyed my mother in the most trivial thing.

I hope my dear young friends the adventures of this little mouse will teach you the fruits of disobedience.

The Little Builders.

John Brown and Jemmy Atkins were great friends. At school, at play, everywhere together, and what quite natural now it was not long before the other knew it also. Now they were watching the masons, who were building a fine store on Main street.

"And you know we were builders, John?" said Jemmy, as he watched the men putting brick after brick upon the wall.

"No, we ain't; we're only boys," said John.

"But we are; we are building a house which is to last forever and ever," said Jemmy earnestly.

"Pooh! now you are fooling," said John. "Nothing in the world lasts forever and ever. That old Morgan house is only a hundred years old, and it will not last a hundred more."

"I can't help that," said Jemmy. "Mother told me our souls would live forever, and we were building houses to live in."

"How is that?" said John soberly.

"Well, she said that we build our characters day by day, brick by brick, just as that man is doing. And if we build, and if we build well, we shall be glad forever and ever, and if we build bad, if we use shabby bricks, or rotten wood, or stubble, we shall be sorry forever and ever."

"That is queer. We ought to be pretty careful, then," said John. "But your mother is such a good woman she knows."

"I think it is all true, for all others, dear you," said Jemmy.

"Yes, if we build right. But let's see, what kind of bricks had we better use?"

"Always tell the truth, that's a big one. Be honest, that's another," said Jemmy.

"Good," said John. "Mind your mother; love is another," said Jemmy.

"There's a big beam of temperance in my building. Mother says that's a good beam and keeps the frame steady."

"Be courteous, there's a brick," said John. "And don't swear, there, that's another."

"And don't speak against anybody, and don't say dirty words," interrupted Jemmy, "and we shall go on building as long as we live, mother says; every single day we add something to our houses."

The gentlemen who owned the new building stood close beside the boys, hidden from sight by a high wall. He listened to their talk intently, and then he stepped around beside them and said, "Pretty good work, my boys, only build on the same foundation."

The boys looked a little frightened, but he smiled so pleasantly upon them that they felt at ease, and listened while he said:

"Give your young hearts to God, my boys; he is the great Master Builder. He will teach you to build so that he will say, 'Well done.' 'Seek first the kingdom of God, and all things else shall be added unto you.' Then he added, "I wish every boy would build as wisely as you plan, dear boys. May God help you to keep them ever!"—Youth's Temperance Banner.

A Curl Cut Off With An Ax.

"Do you see this lock of hair?" said the old man to me.

"Yes; but what of it? It is, I suppose, the curl from the head of a dear child long ago gone to heaven?"

"It is not; it is a curl of my own hair, and it is now nearly seventy years since it was cut from this head."

"But why do you prize a lock of your own hair so much?"

"It has a story belonging to it, and a strange one. I keep it thus with care because it speaks to me more of God and his ways than anything I possess.

"I was a little child of four years old with long curly locks, which, one day, in play, or wind, hung down my cheeks as I ran. That day my father went to the woods to cut logs, and I went with him. I was standing a little way behind, or rather at his side, watching with interest the strokes of the heavy ax, as it went up and came down upon the wood, sending off splinters with every stroke in all directions. Some of the splinters fell at my feet, and I eagerly stooped to pick them up. In doing so, I stumbled forward, and in a moment my curly head lay upon a log. I had fallen just at the moment when the ax was coming down with all force.

"It was too late to stop the blow. Down came the ax. I screamed, and my father fell to the ground in terror. He could not stay the stroke, and, in the blindness which the sudden horror caused, he thought he had killed his boy.

"When I recovered I from my fright, and he from his terror. He caught me in his arms and looked at me from head to foot, to find out the deadly wound he was sure he had inflicted.

"Not a drop of blood or scar was to be seen.

"He knelt upon the grass and gave thanks.

"Having done so, he took up his ax, and found a few hairs upon its edge. He turned to the log he had been splitting, and there was a single curl of his boy's hair, sharply cut through and laid upon the wood.

"How great the escape! It was as if an angel had turned aside the edge at the moment when it was descending on my head. With renewed thanks upon his lips, he took up the curl, and went home with me in his arms."

When old Mrs. Bunsby had got through reading in the morning paper an account of the last fire, she turned her spectacles from her eyes to the top of her head and remarked: "If the city firemen would wear the gunnywine hunt Knit stocking, such as we make and wear in the country, they wouldn't be a bustin' of their hose at every fire."

Lenten Cook Books.

We have seen advertisements of them, but have not examined the books. We can only conjecture what their contents may be. We do not know that the use of them is prescribed by ecclesiastical authority, or that scriptural warrant is claimed for them. We suspect that some wide-awake publisher, appreciating the commercial value of the enterprise, and seeing money in this new and unoccupied field, has of his own motion compiled the work. Ordinary cook books contain descriptions of dishes that are innocent of meat, and that are sufficiently frugal and abstemious for the average ascetic. From them can be learned the most varied methods of preparing eggs, fish, vegetables, and of combining them in ways that shall gratify the palate without pampering the flesh. A cook book just for lent would seem to be a needless expense, but there is a sentimental, perhaps a devotional demand for a book set apart for religious uses, one that has something devout in its title, and in which the type and paper are flavored with the taste of sacredness.

The announcement of lenten cook books is, we fear, a bad sign. If people wish to fast they can certainly do it without any special recipes, and if they desire to eat very little, and that little very simple and plain, the more obvious course would be to lock up all cook books, and banish them from the household and kitchen, until the Easter bells shall sound their recall. Science and art can compound a most satisfactory menu, such as the gourmand would heartily enjoy, without so much as the smell of meat about it. The fasts of which we have account in Scripture were more heroic. That of the Master, from which we suppose the modern Quadragesima takes its designation, was something very different from this lenten fasting. This attempt to make things very nice is not in accord with the austerities, self-denial and mortifications of the flesh which fasting or abstinence is supposed to imply. Elaborate cookery, by book, looks like an effort to disguise the bitter herbs, and to find out some way of self-righteousness which shall require no sacrifice. The Pharisees did fast twice in the week, honestly and severely, and, apart from its supposed justifying merit, their self-denial commands our respect. But what shall we think of a Pharisee's claim to righteousness, while the ground of it is sugar-coated, or altogether evaded? We have a genuine admiration for the rugged preacher who lived on locusts and wild honey. He was a voice crying in the wilderness, and a mighty voice. There was no pretence and no sham about him. His was a hard and self-denying life, with no elaborate cuisine connected with it.

Fasting is good, no doubt. Abstinence, a modified fasting, is also good—for the body and for the soul. But this cook book fasting and abstinence is at least open to suspicion. Our Romish and Anglican brethren have reason to be alarmed. Besides the excess of riot of the carnival, and the unrestrained license that breaks out after Easter, the worldly and fleshly spirit, armed with its cook books, has invaded lent, and laid its profane and sensual hand upon its sacred austerities. As a period of special religious services, and of private religious devotions, the lenten festival is most commendable. But there ought to be something of the salt of self-denial in it, and the mind should not be occupied and diverted by the study of a special literature for the kitchen. A protracted meeting of forty days, with temperate living in the meantime, cannot but do good. Provided, of course, that it be not regarded as a penance for the dissipations which were suspended on Ash Wednesday, with the purpose of resuming them after Easter. How much of formality, self-righteousness and will worship there may be in the observance of lent we do not know, but we may hope that, with due allowance for these abuses, there is a considerable gain of spirituality.

To those of us for whom lent is without authority, ecclesiastical or Scriptural, there is this danger, that we come to regard fasting as altogether an unspiritual thing, and that we come at length to neglect it, as being the figment of a superstitious and perverted asceticism. Because these travesties and abuses of a duty are pushed to the borders of absurdity, there is in this no reason why we should utterly neglect it. The old-time custom among Methodists of fasting on the Friday before quarterly meeting, and on other special occasions, and private fasting or abstinence, has largely fallen into disuse. While fasting is not made prominent in the New Testament, and while the authority of an explicit precept can scarcely be claimed for it, still it has its uses and benefits when properly observed. If it induces a healthier habit of body, contributes to clearer thinking, promotes control of the appetites, and fits the heart for devout meditation and prayer, there is reason enough for it, even if it be not made obligatory by Divine command. Privately, as Christ directs, each one may exercise himself herein, and discover for himself how much, and of what kind, is most beneficial for him. Our general rules, and our form of receiving preachers into full connection, seem to contemplate the use of fasting as a means of grace, and like praying, and religion generally, to be distributed, according to each one's conscience and circumstances, throughout the year. We are without a lenten season, and without lenten cook books, but we are not without the usage and custom of fasting. It is needless to say that we like our Methodist way best, and we would recall our people to its observance.

Sound Conversions.

We used to think that "soundly converted" was an unwarranted phrase, though one in much use and favor among the old time Methodists. For if a man be converted is he not converted soundly? Does God ever half convert anybody, or does the Holy Spirit ever do any unsound work? It is needless to intimate wherein the sophistry lies. There are conversions and conversions, and "soundly" is, we now think, a justifiable an a very significant word.

If by conversion we mean the regeneration of the heart, and becoming a new creature in Christ, this work is always sound. But there are operations of the Spirit less than this, as in conviction of sin; and there are feelings and emotions of a religious character, which may exist while the heart remains unchanged.

There may be a change of opinion merely, a passing from indifference or doubt to a belief in God and the Bible, at the same time that the great spiritual transformation has not taken place. A seeker may conclude that, having surrendered himself to Christ, having believed according to the promise, and having made confession of sin, he is accepted and forgiven, though he has no inward assurance of it. He endeavors to persuade himself that he is reconciled to God, and that he has fulfilled the saving condition of faith, while there is in him no conscious salvation, and no sense of the inward change wrought by the Holy Spirit. It is possible for men, instructed in this way, to take their conversion for granted, and to settle down into this logical apprehension of religion without the witness of the Spirit, and with no inward sense of adoption.

In the case of children, nurtured in religious homes, and in the Sunday-school, the notion largely obtains that religion is a matter of growth and education, without any definite beginning. Whatever the grace of infancy and early childhood may be, it does not obviate the necessity of a special and clear work of the Spirit in the heart. Children, when they come to years, though very tender years, need conversion—a powerful work of the Spirit convincing them of sin, bringing them to repentance, and so changing their hearts that they know that they are the children of God. We can scarcely make a mistake in calling them to repentance, and in insisting upon their need of conversion, however well instructed, or however carefully they have been raised. Whatever they are, they are not soundly converted until they feel and know it for themselves.

There is a mechanical type of religion connected with belief in the saving efficacy of the sacraments and of church drill and forms. The subjects of it are converted inasmuch as they have been baptized, confirmed, have partaken of the Lord's Supper, and are members of the church. They may have no sense of the love of God in their hearts, no witness in themselves, and they may be conscious that no perceptible inward change has taken place.

Wherefore, our wise and godly fathers insisted upon a sound conversion, as opposed to everything that fell short of changing the heart and life, and that did not bring with it a peaceful and joyous assurance of sins forgiven. We have a great many religious people in the church, we have multitudes of well-raised children in the Sunday-school, but they are not all soundly converted. It is not wholly an impertinence to inquire, when the reported conversions are coming in, are they sound conversions?

"Where Is My Boy To-Night."

This is the title of a very popular "gospel song." It is the plaintive cry of an anxious, weeping mother, waiting through the still hours of night, until "the sunrise of morn," for her wayward boy's return. She had watched and waited, wept and prayed, but heard not the welcome sound of his returning footfalls. No sleep for that mother's eye-lids. The pillow was too thorny, the scalding tears too bitter, and the breaking heart too sad and desolate. What agony must have been crowded into those lonely hours! Memory went back to the days of happy young motherhood, when her boy was as innocent and fair as a morning lily. Then she imprinted warm kisses upon his dimpled cheeks and pressed him to her bosom, while imagination painted his brilliant future. She thought of his dutiful boyhood, his noble young manhood, and his splendid career all through life. On his strong arm she would lean in old age, and all his successes were to be her noblest pride and highest joy. But now, alas! that childish innocence is gone, and those bright dreams are shrouded in gloom. Marred by sin, and forgetful of home and mother, the boy who was to be her pride has become her care and sorrow.

O, if young men would only pause and think of the shadows they cast over home—of the anxious hearts and sleepless eyes awaiting their coming—fewer nights would be spent with convivial companions in wild carousals. They would not ruthlessly trample upon a mother's love. The Roman Emperor, who was so dead to all the instincts of humanity as to consent to the death of his own mother, is justly held up to eternal execration as the very exhaustion of moral degradation. But a course of neglect, disobedience and prodigality as surely crushes maternal hope and life as though a death sentence were written in blood by a matricidal hand. Young men, who may chance to read these lines, spare the tears and agony of your mother by a love of home.

The night life of a boy determines his character and career. Known the habits and haunts of his nights, and no prophet's ken is necessary to foretell his history. Read and ponder the following earnest, ringing words from an eloquent writer:

"One night often scuttles a whole life. The leakage of the night keeps the day forever empty. Night is sin's harvesting time. More sin and crime are committed in one night than in all the days of the week. This is more emphatically true of the city than of the country. We live in a different world after dark. The street lamps, like a file of soldiers, with torches in hand, stretch away in a long line on either sidewalk, the gay colored transparencies are ablaze with attractions, the saloons and billiard halls are brilliantly illuminated, music sounds forth its enchantment, the gay company begins to gather at the haunts and houses of pleasure, the gambling dens are filled with palatial splendor, the theaters are wide open, the mills of destruction are grinding health, honor, happiness, hope out of thousands of lives. The city, under the gas-light, is not the same as under God's sunlight. The allurements and perils and pitfalls of night are a hundredfold deeper and darker and more destructive. Night life in our cities is a dark problem, whose depths and abysses and whirlpools make us start back with horror. All night long tears are falling, blood is streaming, hearts are bleeding, sin is cursing, crime is rioting. Wails load the air, and the hideous, anguished cry goes up to heaven. Every night young men sink to rise no more."

The same is also true of our smaller towns and villages. The debauchees and criminals of the land are the grown up boys who spent their evenings away from home. This should serve as a solemn warning and earnest entreaty, a warning to parents to be more careful and watchful for their boys, and an entreaty to young men to flee the temptation of night life. Boys should rarely, if ever, spend a night with their young companions. Away from the restraints of the parental roof, they are soon led into ruin. A criminal, about to suffer the law's extreme penalty upon the scaffold, uttered these farewell words: "My first step in sin was my first night away from home; that was my ruin. For that night's teaching and influence I stand on this scaffold, and must die a criminal's death. O, young men! standing here, in a moment of eternity, and with a hangman's rope around my neck, let me beg you to keep your nights clean and pure."

What a revelation is the docket of a police court! The offenders brought there for trial, in nearly every instance, are arrested at night. Evil deeds love darkness and hate the light. Then, by every consideration of filial affection, social position, laudable ambition, business success, health, happiness and long life, we should guard our nights with jealous care. If our evenings are pure our mornings will be fresh and joyous.

The Recent Regicide.

The cruel assassination of Alexander II, Emperor of Russia, on Sunday, March 13, has filled the Christian world with mortification and grief. I have heard people speak complacently of the dark ages as gone by long ago, but repeatedly men are reminded that civilization, unless it have the true gospel ground work, does not progress or ascend in the order of a climax to the ideal goal, but hopelessly moves in a circle. Saume, the poet, rightly says:

"The people are what they have always been,
A mixture foul of strength and weakness mean;
Sometime doth reason rule, but oft'ner passion fierce."

In what has the boasted civilization of to-day improved on that of Julius Cæsar, who succumbed to the daggers of Brutus and colleagues? If not elevated by the spirit of Christ, mankind continue their abode throughout all ages on the dead level of more or less polished brutality. Christless civilization is but a thin coat of varnish, nothing more.

But, as in the case of Cæsar, the object of the murderers will not be accomplished by the recent regicide. Honest and faithful Cæsar was succeeded by oily-tongued Octavius, who, though not openly but hypocritically, brought about those very governmental changes which the assassins wished to avert. "The king is dead, long live the king!" is the laconic proclamation oftentimes made known by the public criers in Paris when a monarch had died and his successor ascended the throne. Alexander III will certainly endeavor to carry out the political programme of his martyr father. He, too, is aware that the vague theories of the Nihilists are wholly impracticable, and that the reign of the communist, should the Nihilists ever succeed, would be the most terrible form of despotism.

Born on April 29, 1818, Alexander II attained to the age of nearly sixty-three years. He succeeded his father, Nicholas I, to the throne, while the Crimean war was fiercely raging, on March 2, 1855. A year later the treaty of peace was signed in Paris. Now began his benign and reformatory career. Railroads, to this time almost unknown in Russia, rapidly pushed forward. In 1859 he took the initiatory steps toward the liberation of the serfs. On March 3, 1863, it was consummated.

Nihilists have attempted to show that said liberation was not an act of humanity, for the condition of the peasantry was now more oppressive than in serfdom. In this country I have heard similar remarks in regard to the negroes, because government did not give to each of the emancipated that "forty acres and a mule." A government which will succeed next to political and social disenfranchisement, to enrich the disenfranchised ignorant masses so as to render indigence impossible, is a chimera. The poor, Christ has said, we shall have always with us. It was Louis Napoleon who remarked, soon after his coup d'etat, that under his government the poorest should, on Sundays, have a chicken in his pot, meaning that he would do away with poverty. But this, like many other utterances of the imperial perjurer, was mere bombast.

Among other reforms which the deceased introduced was the separation of the judiciary from the executive departments of government, limiting the authority of subalterns, establishing an advisory board of legislation, composed of representatives from the various districts, opening new channels of trade, etc.

The various attempts on his life (six in all were made) restrained perceptibly his reformatory efforts. Repeatedly discouraged, he became of late years sullen and even melancholy, laying the weight of government on his trusty friend, Gen. Loris Melikoff.

Alexander II was a liberal and humane monarch. His misfortune may lie in being too far in advance of his people. In temperamental composition he was unlike his father, Nicholas I, whose actions were dictated by impulse and passion. He was meditative, taciturn, a true friend, and a despiser of all sham and pretension.

Nihilism in Russia is what Socialism is in Germany, and Communism in France. All aim at the subversion of the present state of things. They want to do away with all authority, from that of God to that of the constable. Against the church, which they call the wet-nurse of despotism, their ire is specially kindled. So long as this country has the far West to absorb all disaffected elements, it may not have to suffer from the discontent of the rabble, though in our large cities communistic societies are forming, whose aims are said to be identical with those of the Nihilists.

The Need of the Sunday-School is Better Teaching.

Paul rebuked the backsliddeu Hebrew Christians with these words: "When ye ought to be teachers ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." We are ready to congratulate ourselves that we are not as these Hebrews—"unskilful in the word of righteousness." The widespread enthusiasm with which the Sunday-school centennial has been celebrated is certain proof that we are active workers in this branch of Christian duty. Many of our wisest men are giving their best energies to this work, and the result is that they have improved our methods of conducting the Sunday-school so wonderfully that we thank God (boastingly, perhaps,) that we live in this age of Sunday-school revival.

But, after all our boasting, is our zeal according to knowledge? Do we so teach the thousands of tender minds and hearts committed to us in the Sunday-school, that they are savingly impressed with the word of life?

If Paul could visit some of our Sunday-schools, and should be called upon for an address, he would make our hearts burn with words like these:

"We give thanks to God always, brethren, that ye are zealously affected in this good work. Your methods, indeed, commend themselves to the wisdom of men, and the young will take pleasure in them for a season. We also rejoice in your behalf that the opportunity is yours to fill the earth with the knowledge of the Lord, and to give the kingdoms of this world to God and his Christ.

"Nevertheless, I have some what against you. For when many of you ought to be scholars to fill up classes, the very smallness of which is a hindrance to the faith of some, ye are waiting for a straggler or two to drop in, now and then, that ye may be teachers.

"Moreover, brethren, who has led you to believe that teaching in the school of Christ is a light thing? or, as some of you style it, a work of charity? Is it the desire to bring the little ones and the wayward to the Lord Jesus, or the desire for preeminence, that moves you to accept the office of teacher? Think not to say within yourselves that they who are ignorant of the first principles of the oracles of God are worthy to cultivate this nursery for Christ.

"Furthermore, beloved, it is commonly reported of you, and I partly believe it, that ye have sought out many inventions that ye may bring in the young to be taught the Holy Scriptures. Is it that ye cannot so teach the truth revealed from Heaven as to draw them to this place? Surely your labor will be in vain as long as ye make these popular devices so prominent that they choke the pure word, and give to the young an irreverent familiarity with the holy oracles of God. Who told you that God's word stands in need of your supplement? Why do you not rather, by prayer and study, draw the sincere milk from the word of inspiration, and fill the hungry and thirsty souls that will not be satisfied with things that perish with the using? The mines of eternal truth are so rich and inexhaustible that I wonder ye have not worked them more faithfully.

"Finally, brethren, let those whom ye appoint over this work be apt to teach, and full of faith and the knowledge of the glory of God. Put them in remembrance that the word is the sword of the Spirit. Only learn to be skillful in using it, and the enemies of righteousness will not be able to stand before you. But take heed that ye wound not yourselves, for it is a two-edged sword, and exceeding sharp, that is put into your hands."

Temperance Again.

Having just read an article in the Advocate, on Temperance, signed A. G. Miller, I am disposed to "show my opinion" touching prohibition, of which he treats. In the first place, I certainly believe that the process of mere "reasoning" and "suasion" as to the liquor traffic has been tested to its utmost capacity to produce reformation. They have had their day," and have accomplished but little as to this mammoth evil.

For one, I have been trying to "reason" on this subject for twenty years, and, in my opinion, the hour has struck when we must give "prohibition" a fair trial.

The church and ministry must step to the front in this movement. Washingtonians, the sons, the social circle, the friends, the Murphyites, have had opportunity to test their powers, and find themselves insufficient. Now, let the "sacramental host of God" rally their forces, and by invoking the aid of legislation, drive the monster from the land. The writer has tested the practicability of a prohibitory movement for himself. With petition in hand, he has gone among the people, and he has found a ready response from all classes favoring "prohibition." The most inveterate drum-drinkers, knowing the dreadful sting of the serpent, have been among the foremost to sign a petition for "prohibition." The result is that the Legislature of Alabama has passed a bill utterly abolishing the liquor traffic within the bounds of Macon county, to take effect on the first day of January next.

Let the church of our risen Lord bestir herself all over the land on the subject of downright prohibition, and soon the day of glorious liberty will dawn.

J. Bancroft.

Tuskegee, Alabama.

For the honor and honesty of the church, we would fain believe that such language as we give below is not often justified, and not often called for. Instances of such neglect to support the preacher, are, however, not wanting in almost every section of the itinerant field. Perhaps the following from the Richmond Christian Advocate may stir up some pure minds by way of remembrance:

"Why did you not remain in A——?" asked one preacher of another. "Well, for the best reason in the world: I couldn't live on soft soap and sawdust, and find myself, at that," was the somewhat inelegant, but very significant reply. It is too often the case that after promising the preacher the smallest compensation that conscience or decency will permit, his stewards leave him to "find himself" as best he can for perhaps three-fourths of the year. They seem to have an idea that he can live on air, or, what is hardly less nourishing, a mere promise; and will not unfrequently permit month after month to pass by without making the slightest serious effort to supply his urgent needs. Suppose they were to treat their hirelings on their farm in the same way, how long would they be able to command their services? No, they must be paid, and all other current obligations must be met; but he who watches for their souls must wait, wait, wait. He must run up accounts at the grocer's, his children must be shoeless, and actually suffer from cold; his wife, perhaps already broken down in health, must be a drudge; he must cut down expenditure, even to the point of stopping his church paper—all because nobody will take the trouble or forethought to collect and pay over his little stipend. The preacher has now been at work three months of the Conference year, and his barefooted child says, "Papa hasn't received but five dollars yet." This is too bad, brethren. You mean to pay his salary—why not do it as he earns and needs it? If you find it hard to collect it just now, why, put your hands into your own pockets and advance it to him. Surely you can trust your church to make it up; or, if not, you can surely trust him who remembers and rewards even the gift of a cup of cold water to one of his disciples. What you give to Christ and his cause is all that you really save. All that you are laying up on earth shall utterly perish. All that you give to Christ is so much treasure laid up in heaven. Lay down this paper, and go at once and look after the man of God and supply his wants. You will sleep better to-night, and be a happier man to-morrow.

Beauties of the Exodus.

Those who incited and encouraged the negroes to leave the Sunny South for the rigorous North, are accountable for the miseries which these victims of avarice and partizan hate are now suffering. Parson Conway and others who have been active in promoting the movement, deserve the execration of all good men. Now that the presidential election is over, and the pitiful plight of the deluded negroes is exposed, we shall probably hear little of the exodus for some years to come. The following letter, published in the Inter Ocean, Chicago, tells how the negroes in Kansas are faring.

North Topeka, Kan., Feb. 27, 1881.

To the Editor of the Inter Ocean:

My Dear Friend: Thou will do our cause good service if thou will kindly copy the inclosed appeal in thy excellent and widely circulated paper. Thy friend truly, Elizabeth L. Comstock.

CONDITION OF THE REFUGEES.

North Topeka, Kan., Feb. 27, 1881.

To the Public:

The unusually severe weather the last few weeks has produced more suffering and sickness among the colored refugees in Kansas than has been known since the exodus commenced.

We are obliged to make an earnest appeal for aid in our present extremity. Food is wanted to keep them alive until they can get work. Fuel is needed, and it is very high in price here. Medicine for the sick, who are very numerous now. Coffins and graves are in daily demand. Some of the refugees have been sheltered in wretched outhouses, hovels, and sheds, that Northern farmers would not think suitable for their cattle and pigs. Some have slept in tattered tents and old wagons. A great many have been without beds, and but few have had sufficient bedding and clothing. The result is, many are crumpled, with limbs twisted and distorted with rheumatism; frozen feet and fingers are not uncommon; coughs, colds, pneumonia, consumption, etc.,

...hile generous men and women are ...ting their money in the education ...en, we want something done for ...men. While we are providing for ...higher education of our business ..., lawyers, doctors, and preachers, ...ould have something done for the ...men, who are to be their wives and ...mistresses of their households, and ...will give moral form and color to ...and coming generations. It is time ...some wise, great-hearted man or woman had done something for the higher education of women in the South. We wonder that it has not been done already. It is singular that some one with the means at hand has not felt the impulse to do this thing, and felt it so strongly that successful resistance was impossible. These times have brought no grander opportunity than this. No investment for education could promise richer results.

There are men and women in every Annual Conference who could now plant these seeds whose fruits would enrich the land in the development of cultivated Christian womanhood, and win themselves grateful remembrance on earth and eternal rewards in heaven.

The Legislature of North Carolina has passed a bill to submit the question of prohibiting the liquor traffic to the people. The Raleigh Christian Advocate, March 16, says:

The suspense which has held the good people of the State in reference to the great question of prohibition for the last sixty days is relieved. The Legislature has decided by a good large majority to submit the question to the people at an election to be held in August, and if a majority of the people vote for prohibition, the law is to go into effect October 1, 1881.

—Bro. Galloway's reminder about expenses of delegates to the Ecumenical should not be overlooked. As the Louisiana Conference has no representative in that august body, our preachers, if minded so to do, might contribute to pay expenses of delegates who are members of other Conferences. Rev. Dr. Andrews, who goes from the Mississippi Conference, by virtue of his position as president of Centenary College, belongs largely to Louisiana. Rev. Dr. Ahrens, of the German Mission Conference, lives and labors in Louisiana, and the American brethren ought to aid him. It is yet three or four months before the time to start, but it is always well to be prompt in taking collections.

—Centenary College, Jackson, La., has 131 students; of these 17 are preparing for the ministry. There is reason in this last item for hurrying up the collection directed by the Louisiana Conference, to be taken for the expenses of young men studying for the ministry at Centenary College. Rev. Dr. Tudor is to preach the commencement sermon, Sunday, May 29.

—The New Orleans District Conference will be held at the Louisiana Avenue Church, in this city. The opening session will be on Thursday, April 7, at five o'clock P. M. Bishop Keener will preside.

—We learn that a Convention of Conference Sunday-school secretaries will probably be held in Nashville, May 3 and 4.

Rev. G. W. Brehmun, writing from Chester, Miss., March 16, says: "The first quarterly meeting for Chester circuit, North Mississippi Conference, was held here on the twelfth and thirteenth instant. Rev. T. C. Wier, presiding elder, did good work. Besides the regular services of the occasion, he aided in organizing a Bible Society, on Saturday night, and preached an excellent temperance sermon on Sunday night. We are falling into the prohibition movement here. Attala county is organized, and this will be on the twenty-sixth instant. We are working hopefully for the suppression of the iniquitous traffic and use of ardent spirits in this State."

The Rev. George Muller, the famous English exponent of faith in prayer and philanthropic worker, preached in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, in New York, on Thursday evening, Feb. 24. The various denominations show him a friendly hand in all directions. The following facts are embodied in one of his public statements:

For fifty years and six months I have obtained through the Lord all the temporal necessaries for myself and my family, without having been obliged to ask any human being for assistance. I have been able to found 107 schools, to distribute 281,000 copies of the Bible in all parts of the world. In the last forty years I have sent 73,000,000 tracts to all parts of the globe, to believers and to unbelievers. God has entitled me to build five orphan asylums, which are so large that they contain in all about 581 rooms. These cost $500,000, but I had $25,000 more than I needed. We accommodate in these 2,050 children, and we have 108 assistants. The annual expense of running these asylums is $120,000. All my assistants I got through God's instrumentality. My unfailing remedy for all misfortunes has been prayer and faith. I beseech you, therefore, not to be discouraged, but to continue your work, whatever it may be, believing implicitly that your prayers will be granted if you have fulfilled the necessary conditions. New York Christian Advocate.

Of our two ailing Bishops, the Nashville Christian Advocate, of March 19, says: The latest news from Bishop Wightman is not so favorable as we could wish. He has lost rather than gained since our last report to our readers. The hope is indulged that the mild spring weather may have a favorable effect upon him. In the meantime the sympathy and prayers of the church will be extended to our beloved chief pastor in this protracted affliction.

Bishop Pierce preached recently at Sparta, Ga., and says it did not hurt him. His laryngeal affection, however, is obstinate. The ocean voyage across the Atlantic may be what he needs. If he could come back to us restored to health, the Methodist Ecumenical Conference, which calls him to London, would be popular with Southern Methodists.

Personal and Other.

—Admiral Bythesea, a very distinguished officer, who has just retired from the service after having for many years filled the post of consulting naval officer to the government of India, got his name by being, when an infant, picked up at sea by a ship-of-war, lashed to a bale of goods. Inquiry failed to elicit any sort of information about this human flotsam; so the ship's officers adopted him and called him "By-the-sea," and sent him to a naval school. The first ship in which he served was that which had saved his life. He has the Victoria Cross and the Order of the Bath.

—The latest and most reliable German authorities fix the present population of the world at 1,455,000,000. Of these Europe (without Iceland and Nova Zembla) has 315,629,000, or 1,791 inhabitants to a square mile; Asia, 834,707,000, or 1,031 to every square mile; Africa, 205,679,000, or 378 to a square mile; Australia and Polynesia, 4,031,000, or 24 to a square mile. A writer in the Jewish World points out that, contrary to the received idea, the older Rabbins of the Talmud taught that the world was round. This is shown by a passage in which, in discussing idolatry, the figures holding in the hand a baton, a bird, or a globe were prohibited, because the baton symbolizes the dominion of the world, the bird that the world flies beneath it, and the globe is forbidden because it resembles the form of the world itself.

The Khedive of Egypt has given orders to the Grand Chief of the Religious Corporations that the ceremony known as the "Dossa" must henceforth cease. The "Dossa" was a procession which took place annually in Cairo, in the national ceremony known as Mowled-el-Nabi," and consisted of the passage of a sheik on horseback over his prostrate coreligionists.

The anchor lost by Columbus' fleet on the 11th of August, 1498, has been dug up in Venezuela from a depth of six feet below the surface of the ground, 372 feet from the nearest point of the coastline. Books and Periodicals.

Chips From the White House is the title of a volume recently published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston. The work is compiled by Jeremiah Chaplin, and the contents consist of selections from the speeches, conversations, diaries, letters, and other writings of all the Presidents of the United States. More than one-half of the book is taken up with Lincoln, Grant, Hayes and Garfield. This fact in itself gives the work a partizan and sectional tone, and, perhaps, also indicates its purpose. It is not, however, without interest, and may be of some value to the student of our political history. The volume is a 12mo of 488 pages. Price, $1.50.

MODERN MAID OF ATHENS.

By those crossed eyes which flaunt their fire,
Maid of Athens, we must part!
Your will is strong, your temper's fiery,
And, when I go and when I come,
Your tongue swings like a pendulum
Hear my prayer before I go,
Remember this my last request,
And, if you can't for an hour be so,
Keep it still and let the rest.

By those jangled locks all uncombed,
Blown all about by every wind;
By that curved nose of your Grecian kind,
Like an interrogation point,
Clerk that forgot determination
Oh! bird, I beg this one be lent,
And, if you can be quiet for so,
Keep it still and let the rest.

By those lips that never close
So those crossed eyes block doing their work,
By my half heart, so prompt to sell
What words can never speak so well,
Your tongue is darting to and fro,
You pour both words like one possessed,
But, if you can for an hour be so,
Please keep it still and let us rest.

Maid of Athens, I am gone
I'll let your peace when I'm alone.
Ah, thoughtfully to ponder
Your slightest looks shall guide my soul
Can I cease to love thee? No!
That I can cease to sin from east to west,
But, if you can for an hour be so,
Oh! keep it still and let the rest.

"What's the news?" asked Jones of Fogg, who had been poring over the newspaper for half an hour. "News?" exclaimed Fogg. "Lots of it. A dozen or two miraculous cures by Aberdeen's Oil, a few testimonials for Jump Jilters, Pilgarlic's Persistent Pills, and Fuca's Aboriginal Cureall. Then there are thrilling accounts of seventeen different kinds of pads for as many parts of the body, together with a brisk and copious assortment of absorbents, purifiers, detergents, anti-scorbutics, reflex renovators and renewers. Oh, yes, lots of news. Paper running over with news."

THE PHILOSOPHY OF METHODISM.

BY REV. W. G. BLACK.

Concerning this work Dr. L. Parker, editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, says: "The history, statistics, polity and doctrines of Methodism are clearly and compactly stated to the nation, and the causes, under God, of the wonderful success of Methodism, are unfolded with much acumen and analytical power. We hope it will be extensively circulated." The Mississippi Methodist says: "The work shows the hand of a master. Every body friend to sound Methodism, ought to read it." Pastors will do a good work in circulating it among their people. One street has just recorded for thirty hundred copies for gratuitous distribution. More than a thousand copies were sold within sixty days of its publication. Price 20 cents or $2 per dozen. For sale by TIMBER LOTS.—Not every man who owns a timber lot manages it to the best possible advantage. A specimen case enough, at this season, to take care of this kind of land. Most people who have had no experience with it would feel sure that it required less than half of such as is needed to carry on an ordinary farm. But experience is a great teacher, and frequently makes unexpected and astonishing revelations. Most men who assume the care of wooded lands find sooner or later that, in order to cut everything at a time and in a manner which shall be the most profitable, they need all the ability and skill they possess. There are two opposite directions in one of which there is a strong liability to err.

Many owners of timber lots cut wood and timber clean wherever they go, and without waiting until the trees reach maturity. This course involves a great waste. All clean cutting must cause loss, if the land is to be kept for growing wood or timber; for it involves the removal of a great many young trees, which are worth nothing of any consequence for wood, but which, having got well started, are in a condition to rapidly increase in value. If the old trees were taken out and the sprouts and young trees allowed to grow, a perpetual woodlot could be easily maintained. Some people, who do not cut everything, are yearly cutting trees which, though large enough to be of some value, are yet growing rapidly, and can only be cut at a great sacrifice; for when a tree has reached a trunk diameter of six or eight inches it has attained a stage at which it makes a much more rapid growth than ever before. Five years added in the age of such a tree insures a large addition to its size and value. At this stage trees seem to grow as much in one year as they do in five years of their early life. To cut trees thus is like keeping a lot of pullets until they begin to lay, and then, just at the point at which they begin to do something toward paying the expenses of their keeping, killing and selling them for poultry.

There is another extreme to which some owners of woodlands go, which involves about as much loss as the course which has just been described. These men let their timber stand too long, and it becomes injured by the effects of age and its inevitable tendency to decay. The writer has in mind what was once a splendid grove. It was owned by an old gentleman, who had grown up on the farm containing the grove, and whose more than fourscore years dated back to the early life of the trees. He knew that the trees were as valuable as they ever would be, and that self-interest dictated their removal; but his affections clung to the old trees, and he determined that they should stand until he was gone. Many a farmer in that little community felt a sense of personal loss when those splendid old oaks were removed; yet it was found that the ages had stood far too long. Many of them had hollowed at the stump and bore the marks of injuries inflicted by age. And there are many owners of timber-lands in which there are many trees which have passed their prime and are now rapidly on the decline. The loss involved in allowing these trees to stand is very great. They should be removed at once, and the young trees which are growing up around them should thus be given a chance to obtain the sunshine and plant-food which they need for rapid development.

A good method in the management of timber-lots is to cut out crooked and defective trees, even though they are small. In their growth these poor specimens use materials which if secured by better trees would prove valuable. The "survival of the fittest" should not be left to the slow operations of nature, but should be secured by the prompt action of the owner of the land. Except for special purposes, where such a course seems necessary, trees should not be cut until they are fully developed or have reached that size which is best adapted to the purpose for which they are designed. But when they have become well-matured they should be removed.—Ohio Farmer.

PREVENTING SCABBY POTATOES.—Housewives dislike the scabby, scurvy potatoes, that have in the latter days been so common. They do not look nice, they are wasteful, and there is nothing pleasant about them. Still we scrape and wash, and wash and scrape, for baked potatoes are a real luxury, and we do not want them always boiled. The other day a friend told me how to prevent potatoes being so rough and scabby. Two years before, his brother, a small farmer, fell short of manure, and set his wits to work to provide a cheap substitute. He had mantled part of his potatoes in the hill. He had a quantity of forest leaves that he had used to bank his house, piled up in the January cold, so for the lack of something better, he mulched manuring his potatoes with the leaves. These potatoes grew fully as well, were as large, and had more blossoms than those manured from the compost heap. When he harvested them, the contrast was quite marked. The potatoes were more uniform in size, larger and more of them, and they were perfectly smooth.

Last year he plowed as many loads of leaves into his ground as if it were manure, then he put them into the hill, and planted his potatoes as usual. There still was far ahead of the preceding year. The potatoes yielded splendidly, and not a scab was found on the whole piece; the potatoes were as smooth and good as potatoes raised thirty years ago. He told his brother that he was not philosophical enough to explain the reason, but he was satisfied that the decaying leaves furnished the right kind of plant-food for potatoes, and that hereafter he should use it in preference to any other fertilizer, and earnestly recommended his brother to do the same. Will it not be pleasant to have nice potatoes again? This method is worth trying at least, as I never yet knew farmers to have quite manure enough in the spring.—Farmer's Wife, in Country Gentleman.

ECONOMY OF FEED FEEDING FOR MILK.—Large yields of milk must necessarily be the result of a large quantity of food consumed; for the cow can not create milk out of nothing. She is not a miracle worker. But does it follow that a large product of milk costs more in proportion to quantity than a medium yield?

Now, the cow must be supported before she gives any milk. After this food of support, all the food she consumes must go to the production of milk or flesh, and if the cow is a good milker it all goes to milk; in other words, after the food of support, the extra food all goes to profit—that is, either to milk or flesh. And it is equally clear that all the food consumed to support the system of the animal is lost until the point of production is reached. After the producting point is reached, the more the animal can eat, properly digest and assimilate above this, the greater the profit. This would seem to be too plain to require illustration. What would any one think of a manufacturer who used a steam engine for power, who would say that it required as much fuel to get up full steam because the last half of the steam's force than the first half? Now, if there is only fuel enough used to heat the water just below the boiling point, it will consume a good deal of fuel to do this, but no power will ever be produced by it, and this fuel is thrown away. The fuel required to keep the water heated up to two hundred degrees only requires fifty per cent. added to give one hundred pounds steam pressure and see the machinery all at active work. It is evident that if only half steam is produced it costs little more than three-fourths as much as full steam, and consequently all the work that is done with this half power is done at an additional cost.

Just so when the cow is only fed so as to produce a half yield of milk, it costs more than three-fourths as much as a full yield, and the half yield is produced without profit, or even at a loss. Now, to produce steam most economically you must have a well-constructed boiler and engine; but whatever the boiler may be, it costs less in proportion to work to run it, to its full capacity than to half its capacity. So, if you desire to produce milk at the least cost, you must select cows with the capacity to turn the largest amount of food into milk—the larger the amount the more cheaply will the milk be produced. Of course the best cow is the one that can digest and assimilate the most food, and turn all the extra food into milk, instead of laying on flesh and fat. It is the business of a skillful dairyman to select such cows, and then make full use of their machinery to secrete milk, by full feeding.—National Live Stock Journal.

HINTS FOR FARMER'S WIVES.—Provide boxes or shelves with apartments, and place in appropriate divisions, distinctly marked, all refuse screws, nails, bolts, rivets, staples, tacks, etc., and replenish them as needed by purchases at hardware stores, procuring all the kinds and sizes you ever want. Such things always at hand, costing, perhaps, but a few cents, may save you dollars in time, when repair is needed at a busy time and laborers are waiting. Keep all the hinges and latches about the house oiled, to prevent wear and squeaking. Go over them once a week with oil and feather; make regular work of it! Keep gates properly greased at latches and hinges, and see that they do not sag. The labor of dragging a sagging gate is as hard as if it is useless. Use coal ashes for wood dust, or both, in all your vaults daily. This will prevent all bad odor, rendering the cleaning as easy as shoveling sand, and will prevent all danger of wells becoming poisoned by the drainage. Give pure water to animals. Cows are sometimes watered from wells in the manure yard, emitting impurities, and the milk is thus more or less deteriorated and poisoned, the latter tainted, and the owner wonders why his family suffers so much from sickness. If you expect good healthy pigs and wholesome pork, let them have pure water, pure food and constantly clean quarters. We have actually seen the careless and dirty character of some farmers photographed in their filthy pig-pens. Use petroleum as a preservative of all exposed wood-work and tools. It is very cheap, and penetrates the pores. It is good for all wood buildings, good for gates, farm wagons, rakes and forks, and for all rustic work exposed to weather. It will pay its cost back again at least one thousand per cent.

A NEW MODE OF GRINDING WHEAT.—The Maine Farmer, after reciting the improvements made in grinding grain from primitive ages down to the period when the French burr stones came into use, adds: "Recently the new process of making flour was discovered, and that part of the wheat which was formerly fed to stock, now makes the best and highest priced flour in the market. But the time has come when the famous burr stones are superseded, and wheat is no longer to be ground, but crushed or cracked. In all the best mills in Minneapolis the millstones have been taken out, and the Hungarian steel rollers have taken their places. These rollers are about thirty inches long and eight inches in diameter. It takes five sets of rollers to finish the flour. Each set of rollers runs closer than the preceding. After the wheat passes each set of rollers it is bolted or sifted through coarse cloth. This cloth lets the disintegrated particles of wheat through and passes off the husky and large pieces, which are run through another and closer set of rollers and cracked again. The first rollers have little else but white hulls and the waxy germs of the wheat, which do not crack up, but smash down like a piece of wax. The germ of a kernel of wheat is not good food. It makes flour black. By the old millstone process this waxy germ was ground up with the starchy portion and bolted through with the flour. By the new system of cracking the kernel instead of grinding it, this germ is not ground, but flattened out and sifted or bolted out, while the starchy portions of the wheat are crushed into powdered wheat or flour.

COAL STOVES.—The manufacture of sugar from the cane, of the ordinary corn, it has been said, is an industry destined soon to be the leading one in our land. Perhaps, suggests the Newark Advertiser, this is an exaggeration, but certain it is that there is sugar in the cane of the ordinary corn and much more in the sweet corn. The trouble with it and with sorghum was the sugar took the form of glucose, and was only available for syrups and the common uses of molasses. That difficulty has been overcome and a very fine crystallized sugar is now produced from the cornstalk at remunerative prices. It is the old story of cutting a crop at the right time. Once past a certain stage of growth the crystalline character of the cane juice is gone forever, but properly cut, there is sugar enough in Indian corn to supply the world. If, as may confidently be expected, the making of sugar from cornstalks is to become a profitable industry, there must be the same careful science as is now employed in the sugar refineries of France and the United States in working the beets of the one and the coarse sugar of the other. A sugar refinery is a chemical laboratory to which the highest learning must be employed. Only an accomplished analytical chemist can produce the higher grades of sugar, and only a large capital is competent to undertake the business.

POTATOES.—Potash, says a writer, is absolutely necessary to successful potato growing. The easiest and best mode of supplying it is in the form of wood ashes. It is furnished also in sufficient quantity in coal ashes and well-rotted yard or stable manure.

Household.

CAREME, THE GREAT COOK.—Careme was a cook of supreme talent, and came from humble parentage. There was a famous Jean de Careme, chef de cuisine to his sanctity Pope Leo X. This Pope, in the Lenten season, having complained of the sameness of diet, Careme, who was a prodigious genius, invented special dishes composed of fish. Fish were transmogrified into the semblance of capons, and it is said that with fish scales he so decked a turbot, that for all the world, it looked like a roasted peacock, with magnificence of tail. The later Careme, the rival of his great ancestor, was almost of our times. Born just before the French Revolution, in early life he became illustrious as a cook and died some time in 1833. He accepted a position as chef of the Prince Regent's kitchen in London. Careme was a man of progress. He accepted at once, without hesitation, the romantic period in art, and while French brains appreciated Hugo, the elder Dumas and Vigny, Careme shaped his dishes so as to meet the views of a no less important portion of the human organism. This is, then, the story with the gastronomic moral some little expanded:

Once the great cook, who was a philanthropic man, met a poor woman who was crying bitterly at the door of a second-class wine-shop and restaurant. Inquiring of this weeping woman what was the matter, her reply was, that her husband, a silversmith, making good wages, was spending all the money he earned in eating and drinking. Careme believed in the capabilities of his art, and never doubted for once the causes which led the husband away from his own house. Questioning the wife, he found out that she was an indifferent cook, but worse than that, was in the habit of giving her husband boiled 365 days in the year. An inspiration idea at once seized the great cook. He had the fullest confidence in his art. He wrote down the woman's address, and next day visited the house of the silversmith, ostensibly with the purpose of having a cup repaired. But a nobler aim was his. Drawing a woodcock from a basket, the master showed the wife how to dress it, and silversmith, woman and Careme sat down to breakfast. For the first time happiness beamed on that household. Careme called frequently after this, always provided with some viand, which, like an unpolished stone, became as a brilliant gem when touched by the hand of genius. The silversmith's wife was quick to appreciate the difference in her husband's conduct. She became in time an efficient cook, and so regained her husband's affections. The wine-shop, the second-class restaurant, had no charms for him. He saved his money, for he ate now at home.

Now come those finer moral effects which only a Frenchman could imagine. Better food acted on the brain of the silversmith. From being nothing more than a repairer, a tinkerer, he rose to be a master workman, a Benvenuto Cellini, an artist. One day the illustrious Careme received a silver woodcock, with every soft ruffle of feather executed in silver, with the inscription: "To Careme, from a friend who was saved by good cooking."—From Valuable Cooking Receipts, by T. J. Murrey.

CABBAGE FARCIE.—Take a small, hard head of cabbage, removing the two or three outer leaves. Have a pot of boiling water ready, with plenty of salt in it. Put in the cabbage and let it stay ten minutes, and then place it in cold water. Try it. Take an apple-corer and cut out in the middle a kind of well-like hole. Have any cold meat, which chop fine. Season this with pepper and salt, a little grated nutmeg and some thyme. To stiffen it, add the yolks of two eggs, to the farcie. Fill up the hole, which cover with a bit of beef, bind up the cabbage with twine. Use plenty of twine, so that it will be secure. This is best boiled in stock; but if stock is not at hand take some pieces of ham or bacon, and some beef bones, and put them in the water. Boil the cabbage thoroughly, and serve dry.

ANISE CAKE.—Four ounces of flour, after weighing add a heaping table spoonful of the same material; twelve ounces of powdered sugar, a tablespoonful of salt, the whites of eleven eggs, beaten before beaten, rose is generally used, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar. Put sugar, flour, salt and cream of tartar together, and sift through a fine sieve six times, then stir in lightly the whites of the eggs, beaten to a stiff froth. Put into a pan without grease and bake in a good oven about fifty minutes. This cake must be baked in a new pan, as one kept for any other purpose does not answer as well. When baked turn it over on two or more tumblers until cold, then remove it from the pan and tie it with thin string. Soda is not used and a pan with a tube in the centre is preferable for baking.

DISINFECTING YOUR PREMISES.—A good disinfectant is the following: Three pounds of copperas dissolved in four gallons of hot water, to which should be added cold, a pint of Colyert's No. 5 carbolic acid. One-fourth of this will disinfect a privy vault. Every bad smelling place, yard, drain or stable should be disinfected every six or twelve days. Fresh slacked lime, or plaster of Paris, or sulphate of iron may be sprinkled in damp places that have a disagreeable odor. Disinfection will keep away diseases. Do not throw lime into privy vaults, as it produces an unfavorable chemical action. Plaster of Paris may, however, be used for all purposes of disinfection about a house or yard, privy vault or stable.

TO REMOVE WRINKLES.—Melt white wax, one ounce, to a gentle heat and add juice of lily bulbs, two ounces, and honey, two ounces, rose water two drachms, and attar of roses a drop or two. Rub the wrinkled place with the preparation twice a day. Use tepid water instead of cold in ablutions.

From the Agriculturist we gain the following useful information: Grass stain can be removed from clothing by pouring boiling water through the stain; it sets the green coloring matter loose; rinsing it away. Do not wash with soap-suds, for it makes a dirt-colored mark and remains an ugly blot on children's white clothing.

JOHNNY CAKE.—One pint of boiled rice or hominy, one egg, one tablespoonful of butter, salt to taste, flour enough to make a soft dough. Roll half an inch thick; bake quick, without blistering; serve hot. Tear the cakes open and butter. Cut the cakes four inches long and three wide.

Glass should be washed in cold water, which gives it a brighter and cleaner look than when cleansed with warm water.

Scientific.

—The Florence Zoological Museum has recently received from Lake Lodavico Marazzani a splendid specimen of a rare and singular rodent (Lophiomys imhausi, and it is claimed one of the very best examples of "defensive mimicry" known in the animal kingdom. The specimen came from a new locality, Erkandi, on the mountains between Sunkin and Tingai. The habitat of this animal is now pretty well defined by lines drawn from Ferukin to Muinan and Kassala, and thence southward toward the Somali coast, a region extending along the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean from Zeila, and inhabited by Arabs. The luxuriant dorsal mane, to which this creature owes its name, is separated from the long hairs of the body by a narrow stripe of short, stiff, greenish bristles. The natives told Count Marazzani that the Lophiomys is rare, that it lives in deep holes in the strangely fissured rocks of that country, and that it is a vegetable feeder. Another singular rodent has been discovered by M. Latash in the Algerian Sahara. It is a sort of field-mouse, its most striking character being the tail, which is short, club-shaped, greatly swollen, and apparently naked, its minute rings and fine white hairs not concealing the rosy tint of the skin in the living animal. Still more remarkable is the structure of the skull, with auditory bony cavities greatly developed, and which is only paralleled by the pouched rat of our Western plains. It is rat or a small mouse, the upper parts fawn color the lower pure white. It will be observed, that like its Western American representatives, it is an inhabitant of dry, desert regions.—New York Independent.

MAX'S GUINEA.—Some French savants have been keeping nine pigs in a state of continual intoxication for a year for the purpose of testing the effects of alcoholic liquors on these animals. The Perfect of the Seine has put some sties in the yard of the municipal slaughter-houses at the disposal of the savants, in order that they might conduct their experiments at little cost. Pigs were chosen for the experiments because of the similarity of their internal organs to those of men. The pig that takes absinthe is first gay, then excitable, then irritable, combative and finally drowsy. The one that takes brandy with his food is cheerful all through, until he falls asleep; the rum swilling pig seems to become sad and somnolent almost at once; while the pig that takes gin is quite eccentric in his ways, grunting, squealing, tilting his head against the sty door, raising on his hind legs as if to sniff the wind. La Science thinks these different effects are due solely to the different kind of intoxicants used. May they not, however, be due, in part, to some difference in the disposition of the pigs?

The conclusion the experimenters draw from these, and some other facts, is, that it is far more likely that man is descended from the hog than from the monkey, as some have affirmed. We have doubt of the correctness of this conclusion. Our observation would appear to justify the belief that some men may be found that have not descended very much below this animal yet.—Northern Christian Advocate.

—The art of chromographie is a new invention by a Nuremberg chemist, and is said to be one that not only furnishes a pleasant pastime for ladies, but one highly remunerative. The art consists of a new method of decorating silks and other fabrics, by means of hollow pencils, which are charged with a fluid metallic compound. The compound hardens instantly on exposure to air, and is furnished in every known color, all of which become indelible, lasting as long as the materials on which they are used. Wooden-ware and pottery can also be decorated and glass shrined in the same manner, the designs and work presenting an unique and handsome appearance. Already have fabrics decorated in this new art taken the place of embroidery to a considerable extent in Germany and France.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE TELEPHONE.—The Patent office has just granted to a Mr. Berliner a reissue of a patent, with several new claims, among which is the recognition of his right to the use of a local battery in connection with telephonic instruments.

This improvement adds greatly to the power of the telephone. It is made so sensitive by it that conversation may be carried on in whispers, while the ordinary modes of conversation are delivered by it in the most perfect and admirable manner. All who have been accustomed to use the telephone, know very well in what a feeble tone the voice is transmitted, even though the sender should almost yell in the instrument. The patent of Mr. Berliner, we believe, is held by the Bell Telephone Company of Boston.

A Paris gentleman has invented a method for coating thread with silk, by means of a chemical process, in a way similar to that in which metallic objects are plated with gold or silver. A solution of the silk is formed in Zeichloride, or other solvent, when the thread to be coated with it has previously been mordanted in a bath is passed through it. Thread thus "galvanized" is pronounced an excellent imitation of the genuine, and experts even find it difficult to detect it commercial qualities. From a commercial stand-point, the practicability of the process is thought questionable.

A Russian geographical explorer has recently filled up a blank in the Tobolsk between the Obi and the Arctic circle, in the discovery of forests of enormous pines considerably beyond the conjectural limits of wood, between the 70th and 78th degrees east longitude. Another explorer, who has been traveling in the region of the glaciers of Zarafshan, one of the greatest in Central Asia, will peaks rising to two thousand feet, reports some wonderful discoveries, among which is that of an ancient prehistoric city, bearing an evidence of numerous population some time in the world's history.

It has been ascertained by scientific gentlemen who have been investigating for some time, that the so-called Gulf stream does not enter the Gulf of Mexico at all. It is now pronounced an Equatorial Current, which comes through the Caribbean Sea from the African coast, is turned northeast upon striking the coast of Yucatan, passes through the Straits of Yucatan and Florida, and out into the Atlantic Ocean. The currents in the Gulf are said to be very slow, and are not connected with the great stream represented in physical geography under that name.

The new twenty-three inch objective glass for the Princeton Observatory, was completed by the Clarks about the middle of January. It proves to be of the highest excellence. The mounting is well advanced, and the Instrument will probably be set up next Autumn, some months in advance of the contract.

A Great Revelation.

SOME VALUABLE THOUGHTS CONCERNING HUMAN HAPPINESS AND TIMELY SUGGESTIONS HOW TO SECURE IT.

Synopsis of Lecture by Dr. Elias Craig, before Metropolitan Scientific Association.

The free and independent thought of this age accepts statements only where they are proven to be truth, while the development of mental power seems equally great in every other department of life. The valuable inventions of the day are counted by thousands. The increase of scientific study is universal. The spirit of inquiry in all fields is so marked as to cause comment on every side, while people seem investigating and advancing in every direction which can help them morally, mentally or physically. This is specially true of the human body and everything which concerns it; and the truths which the people have found, even in the last fifty years, are simply marvelous. How really ignorant some cultured and supposedly scientific people were only a few years ago, as compared with the present day, may be better understood from a few illustrative facts. A prominent writer prepared an elaborate essay, to prove that steamships could never cross the Atlantic, and his pamphlet was issued just in time to be carried by the first steamer that went to England. People once believed that the heart was the seat of life and health. It is now known that this organ is only a pump, simply keeping in motion what other and more important organs of the body have created and transformed. It was once supposed that if a person felt a pain in the back, the liver was deranged; if a pain came in the lower chest the lungs were affected and consumption was near; it is now known that a pain in the back indicates diseased kidneys, while troubles in the lower chest arise from a disordered liver and not imperfect lungs. A severe pain in the head was once thought to come from some partial derangement of the brain; it is now known that troubles in other parts of the body and away from the head, cause headaches and that only by removing the cause can the pain be ceased. It is a matter of private history that Gen. Washington was bled to death. His last illness was slight, and caused principally by weariness. A physician was called who bled him copiously. Strange to say, the patient became no better. Another doctor was called, who again took away a large amount of the vital fluid. This in succession four physicians drew away the life of a great man who was intended by nature for an old age, and who prematurely died, murdered by malpractice, bled to death. That was the age of medical bleeding!

The speaker then graphically described another period which came upon the people, in which they assigned the origin of all diseases to the stomach, and after showing the falsity of this theory, and that the kidneys and liver were the causes of disease, and that many people are suffering from kidney and liver troubles to-day who do not know it, but who should know it and attend to them at once, continued:

Let us look at this matter a little more closely. The human body is the most perfect and yet the most delicate of all created things. It is capable of the greatest results and it is liable to the greatest disorder. The slightest causes sometimes seem to throw its delicate machinery out of order while the most simple and common sense care restores and keeps them in perfect condition. When it is remembered that the amount of happiness or misery we are to have in this world is dependent upon a perfect body, is it not strange that simple precautions and care are not exercised? This is one of the most vital questions of life. People may avoid it for the present, but there is certain to come a time in every one's experience when it must be faced.

And here pardon me for relating a little personal experience. In the year 1879 I found myself losing both in strength and health. I could assign no cause for the decline, but it continued, until finally I called to my aid two prominent physicians. After treating me for some time they declared I was suffering from Bright's disease of the kidneys, and that they could do nothing more for me. At this time I was so weak I could not raise my head from the pillow and I fainted repeatedly. My heart beat so rapidly it was with difficulty I could sleep. My lungs were also badly involved. I could retain nothing upon my stomach, while the most intense pains in my back and bowels caused me to long for death as a relief. It was at this critical juncture that physic'd longing which I felt and which I most firmly believe was an inspiration caused me to send for the leaves of a plant I had once known in medical practice. After great difficulty I at last secured them and began their use in the form of tea. I noticed a lessening of the pain at once; I began to mend rapidly; in five weeks I was able to be about and in two months I became perfectly well and have so continued to this day. It was only natural that such a result should have caused me to investigate most thoroughly. I carefully examined books in medicine never before explored. I sought the cause of physical order and disorder, happiness and pain, and I found the kidneys and liver to be the governors, whose motions regulate the entire system.

After describing at length the offices of the kidneys and liver, and their important part in life, the doctor went on to say:

Having found this great truth I was clear in the conclusion that my discovery, which I had named Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, would be found the remedy that would relieve the suffering from Bright's disease of the kidneys, and that it would cure all diseases of the liver. I had come to them which the life was nearly gone, and by its single, yet powerful influence had purified, strengthened and restored them, and saved me from death. Realizing the great benefit which a knowledge of this truth would confer on the world I began in a modest way to treat those afflicted and to cure. I found the same happy results which I had experienced. Not only the bad cases, who were not conscious of any physical trouble but when, at my suggestion, began the use of the remedy which had saved me, the blood their health steadily improving and their strength continually increasing. So universal, where used, was this true, that I determined the entire world should share in the results, and I therefore ordered the formula for its preparation in the hands of Mr. H. H. Warner of Rochester, N. Y., a gentleman whom I had cured of severe kidney disease, and who, by reason of his personal worth, high standing and liberality in endowing the Astronomical Observatory and other public enterprises, has become known and popular to the entire country. This gentleman at once began the manufacture of the remedy on a most extensive scale, and to-day, Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, the pure remedy that saved my life, is known and used in all parts of the continent.

I am aware a prejudice exists toward proprietary medicines, and that such prejudice is too often well founded, but the value of a pure remedy is not less because it is a proprietary medicine. Because Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure saved my life before it became a proprietary medicine, is it reasonable to suppose that it will not cure others and keep still more from sickness now that it is sold with a government stamp on the wrapper? Such a theory would be childish.

How to restore the health when broken and how to keep the body perfect and free from disease must ever be man's highest study. That one of the greatest revelations of the present day has been made in ascertaining the true seat of health, to be in the kidneys and liver, all scientists now admit, and I can but feel that the discovery which I have been permitted to make, and which I have described to you, is destined to prove the greatest, best and most reliable friend to those who suffer and long for happiness, as well as to those who desire to keep the joys they now possess.

The Water of Lourdes.

BY W. A. HAMMOND, M. D.

But to come to the writer's own experience. For several years he has had the opportunity from time to time of receiving bottles containing the water of Lourdes. One of these, holding about four ounces, was given to him by one of his patients, an estimable Roman Catholic priest, who obtained it at Lourdes; and this, as being the most authentic, was the one employed in the case now to be described. A woman of about thirty years had for over eight months suffered from a very distressing spasmodic affection of certain muscles of the neck, by which her head was strongly rotated to one side, so that she was constantly in the position of one trying to look over the shoulder. Not only was the position uncomfortable, but it was attended with considerable pain, and she was therefore kept in a continued excited and "nervous" condition. When the writer saw her she had already been treated with those means which are most efficacious in the disease in question, and he was consulted mainly for the purpose of getting his opinion in relation to the propriety of allowing the contraction by a surgical operation, and, if deemed advisable, of performing it. One imagining the patient, who was a devout Roman Catholic, expressed her great regret at being unable to go to Lourdes, or to obtain some of the water from the grotto, for she was firmly convinced that if she could be subjected to the influence of this liquid, her cure would be at once effected. Being at the time engaged in new experiments relative to the influence of magnets, the idea arose in the writer's mind to expose the patient to the influence of a powerful magnet, and perhaps produce a cure. Certainly she had expressed implicit faith, the writer determined to see how far so strong faith would go in producing a cure in a case such as he was then in. He accordingly instructed the patient that she had some of the water of Lourdes, and another water which had produced marvelous results, and which, in his opinion, was preferable to the other. This last was called Lourdes. Both were at her service. But she was strongly advised to use the water of Lourdes instead of the other of Paris. She evinced the utmost eagerness, exclaiming that her restoration was assured, and that she would not submit to any other. She begged hard for the Lourdes water, but the writer insisted that days she should try the other, and that, if this proved ineffectual, she should have the water of Lourdes. After many entreaties she was allowed to begin with the Paris water, she consented to try the Lourdes water first. The writer then put into a stunning room, took some of the pungent Lourdes water, poured it into another vial, labeled it "Eau de Lourdes," and gave it to her. She at once applied some of it, as she was directed to do to the affected muscles, and she said, without the least faith or expectation that it would do the slightest good. She went away hoping for the Lourdes water, suspecting that she had two bottles of genuine article in her pocket. According to appointment, she returned. She had rubbed the part several times each day with the water I had given her, but the result, so far from being favorable, was directly the reverse, as was very evident not only in her own account, but from the position of the neck and head. For fear of having had hope to aid her, and thus thwart the action of despondency, I kept expectant attention, so far from having been on the side of a cure, had been directed in the opposite direction. She knew the Paris water would be effectual." Of course the result had been exactly as the writer had expected, the water of Lourdes having been shown to possess no healing virtue aside from that derived from the faith attention and quality which it has with bread pills, colored water, rubbing, etc., when faith is in them. He determined, however, to perform upon this patient the operation of tenotomy, of giving her relief, and of saving her under the strong belief that she was now receiving the water which, at the command of the good Virgin, had thrown from the rock at Lourdes. He accordingly took a quantity of water, drawn from the same source, put it in a vial, and labeled it "Water of Lourdes, East of the Apparition Grotto," and, with apparent reluctance to give even so small a quantity of so valuable a liquid, gave it to her. She received it with most profuse thanks, promising her attention to use it as she reached her home. It was arranged to see her on the following day at noon, and she rushed into the consulting room exclaiming, "I am cured! I am cured! See what the Virgin has done for me!" And, sure enough, there was not the slightest trace of the spasmodic affection. The contracted muscles were relaxed, and she could turn her head with ease in any direction as readily as before the spasm. The water, as the medium of expectant attention, had effected what, to her, seemed a miracle. Truly it is a wonderful thing!

George the Third.

ANECDOTE BY TREVELYAN.

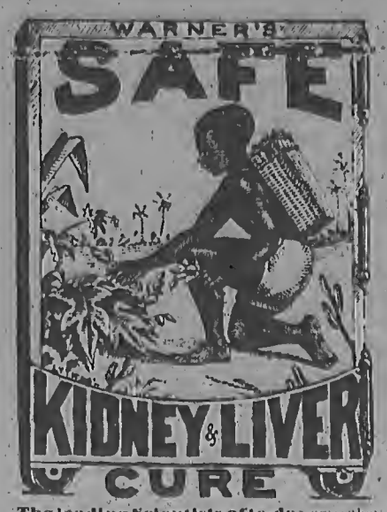
He never allowed himself to be ruffled or put out of his self-control. "Tis no virtue," he said. "I only prefer eating an old little to growing sickly and thin." He would ride in all weathers, either to Windsor or to St. James's, dine, and dress for a levee, at which he gave every individual present some token of his favor or displeasure. Then he would assist at a privy council or do business with his ministers till six in the evening, take tea and a few slices of bread and butter without sitting down to table, and drive back into Berkshire by candlelight. In his recreations he is more hardy and energetic even than in his labors. On hunting days he mounted in the saddle at eight in the morning till the approach of night sent him home to a jug of hot barley-water, which he in vain endeavored to induce his attendants to share with him. As gentleman in waiting tasted nothing of the luxury which the humble mind presumes to be the reward of courtiers, and not a very much of the indulgence which an Englishman of all ranks reckons as his birthright. Doors and windows so habitually open that a point of honor encountered five distinct and thorough draughts on the way from his own room to the queen's bondage; expeditions on foot across country for five miles out and, without shirking a single field or skirting a patch of ploughs; early prayers in winter, with the congregation dwindling daily as the mornings grew cold and darker, until at Christmas the king and his equerry were left to shiver through the responses together. Nothing would have gained men of fortune and men of leisure in such a Spartan service except the strong and disinterested affection with which George the Third inspired all who had to do with him in his character of master of a household.—Early Life of Fox.

Dress.

King George's household was a model of an English gentleman's household. It was early; it was kindly; it was charitable; it was frugal; it was orderly; it must have been stupid to a degree which I shudder now to contemplate. It always rose, rode, dined, at stated intervals. Day after day was the same. At the same hour at night the king kissed his daughters' jolly cheeks; the princesses kissed their mother's hand, and Mme. Thielke brought in the royal nightcap. At the same hour the equerries and women in waiting had their little dinner and cackled over their tea. The king had his backgammon or his evening concert; the equerries yawned themselves to death in the anteroom; or the king and his family walked in Windsor slopes, the king holding his darling little Princess Amelia by the hand; and the people crowded round quite good-naturedly, and the Eton boys thrust their chubby cheeks under the crowd's elbows, and, the concert over, the king never failed to take his enormous cocked hat off, and salute his band, and say, "Thank you, gentlemen." A quieter household, a more prosaic life, than this of Kew or Windsor cannot be imagined. Rain or shine, the king rode every day for hours, poked his red face into hundreds of cottages round about, and showed that shovel hat and Windsor uniform to farmers, to pig boys, to old women making apple dumplings; to all sorts of people, gentle and simple, about whom countless stories are told. Nothing can be more unlike than these stories. When Haroun Alraschid visits a subject, grande, the latter is sure to be very much the better for the caliph's magnificence. Old George showed no such royal splendor. He used to give a guinea some times; sometimes look in his pockets and find he had no money; often ask a dozen hundred questions about the number of his family, about his cows and bears, about the price of pairs for his house and riding. On one occasion he played the part of King Alfred and turned a piece of meat with a string at a cottager's house. When the old woman came home she found a letter with an enclosure of money and a note written by the royal pencil. "Eve guinea is to buy a jack." It was not splendid, but it was kind and worthy of Farmer George.—The Four Georges.

Women as Wives and Mothers.

It is not good for man to be alone. We all need the mother's and we must find it in a wife. Do you know what I think the prettiest story of courtship I ever read? It is the account of Isaac's marriage with Rebecca, away back in the simple old times. You remember the aged man, Abraham, sent his eldest servant into a distant country to find a wife for his son Isaac. And he brought her into his tent to Sarah's joy, and took Rebecca, and she became his wife, and Isaac was comforted for his mother's death. There's the philosophy of it, he added. It's the mother living again in the wife. She is the very instinct in the hearts of all true women, but sooner or later the true wife becomes a mother to her husband. She guides him, cares for him, teaches him and gaugeses him, all in the most way possible. Why, I'm sure I never should know how to get along a day without Polly to tease me. The inquirings and forbiddings of the commonplaces, to lecture me for going out without my muffler, and see that I put on my flannels at the right time, to insist that I shall take something for my cough and raise a rebellion in my going out when there's a northeaster. So much for the lucky, and as for the selfish, I believe it is a woman who holds faith in the world. It's a woman behind the wall, rushing out on the fire that burns brighter, while the devil pours on water, and you'll never get this vanity out of the earth while there's a woman in it. Ed Fathe, love my wife's and your mother's opinion on a mounting of a text of Scripture than all the Doctors of Divinity, and their faith is not much that always holds. Some jackass or other I read once, said every woman wanted a master, and was as forlorn without a husband as a masterless dog. It's a great deal truer that every man wants a mother. Men are more forlorn than masterless dogs, a great deal, when no woman cares for them. Look at the homes single women make for themselves; how neat, how cosy, how bright with the oil of gladness! The fact is, women are born comfort makers, and can get along by themselves a great deal better than men can.



Chinese Servants.

A lady gives in Lippincott's Magazine her experiences with Chinese servants. Among others she mentions the following: "When Ah Ling did his work in the dark, quick way that is characteristic of the Chinese servant, at the same time adding artistic little touchments of his own. He always kept a newly plucked rose in a glass on the sheet in his bureau sink, taking whiffs of its fragrance as he washed his dishes. The boxes of the kerosene lamps he had rose leaves strewn in them, and all the vases in the house were kept filled with fresh flowers and water. Like most true gentlemen, Ah Ling had superfine feelings which were easily wounded. Being too fastidious to mention the fact when we had unwittingly injured his feelings, and yet desirous that we should not languish in ignorance, he had accustomed, running sometimes at awkward seasons, of flattening his face against the wall and remaining rigid for a longer or shorter period. I said nothing at first, but waited till Ah Ling wanted to go to the city to do some shopping. As usual, he came to ask me for a company him, at which I flattened myself against the wall and said nothing. The subject was dropped at once, and Ah Ling stole sheepishly away. After several days he took courage to speak again about going to the city, and again I promptly and silently took his position against the wall. This went on until he voluntarily promised to abstain from all flattening and sulks in the future, and I had no more trouble with him on that score."

Mahogany Trees.

The full grown mahogany tree is one of the most majestic of tropical America. Its vast trunk and massive arms, rising to a lofty height and spreading with graceful sweep over immense spaces, covered with beautiful foliage, bright, glossy, light, airy, clinging so long to the sprays as to make it almost evergreen, present a grand combination of loftiness and grandeur. The leaves are very small, delicate and polished like those of the laurel. The flowers are small and white, or greenish yellow. Lumbermen in felling a tree build a platform twelve feet high, and cut it above the platform, thus relinquishing twelve to fifteen feet of the largest part of the tree. Yet some trees have yielded twelve thousand superficial feet of lumber, and have sold for fifteen thousand dollars.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The leading Scientists of to-day agree that most diseases are caused by disordered kidneys or Liver. If, therefore, the Kidneys and Liver are kept in perfect order, perfect health will be the result. This truth has only been known a short time, and for years people suffered great misery without knowing what to find relief. The discovery of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure marks a new era in the treatment of these troubles. Made from a simple tropical leaf of rare value, it contains just the elements necessary to nourish and invigorate both of these great organs, and safely restore and keep them in order. It is a POSITIVE Remedy for all the diseases that cause pains in the lower part of the body, for Torpid Liver —Headaches, Intermittent Fever, Dull Feelings of the Kidneys, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,
Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.
Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analyses and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of practical novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and workingmen of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

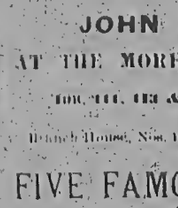
FIVE FAMOUS OPERAS.

MIGNON. (3d) By AMBROISE THOMAS. This very successful opera first became known in Paris, where it slowly but surely worked its way to permanent distinction, and has become one of the standards. It is very full of gems, 400 pages, and furnishes for the purchaser quite a library of modern high order.

AIDA. (3d) Grand Opera by VERDI. Composed for the first festivities for the inauguration of Egypt, and first given in that ancient kingdom, where also the scene of the story is laid. The strange life of old Egypt lives in these tones before us, and is made vivid by the thrilling music of one of the most brilliant of composers.

CARMEN. (4d) By GEORGES BIZET. A Spanish Opera, introducing Spanish types, Soldiers, Spanish Dans, Contrabandistas and Spanish Contraband Traders. We are so flooded with the bizarre ways and infidelities of the Spanish Peninsula, and the music is quite in consonance with the prevailing brightness.



MEFISTOFELE. (4d) By A. BOITO. Mefistofele is the name Boito according to Goethe, whose poem is closely followed throughout. A daring composition, romantic and weird, are now widely given, and pronounced a success.

FATINITZA. (4d) By E. VON SUPPÉ, whose name is most looking and who no others us, in a free and easy and humorous way the Russians and Turks during the war. Very popular.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

San Francisco, March 15.—Brevet Major Gen. Emory Upton, United States army, was found dead in his room this morning, having shot himself through the head some time during the night. When discovered, the revolver was still grasped in his hand. Nothing to indicate the cause of the act has yet been discovered. The general impression seems to be that grief at the loss of his wife prompted suicide.

Vicksburg, Miss., March 15.—The regular monthly meeting of the Mississippi Valley Cotton Planters' Association was held here to-day, with a good and influential attendance of planters.

Resolutions of the business men and Cotton Exchange of Memphis, and also a letter from President Hill, were read, inviting this association to hold its annual meeting next May in Memphis. The invitation was cordially and unanimously accepted.

A resolution was also passed directing the President to invite delegates from all the cotton States, as well as manufacturers of cotton and cotton machinery throughout the United States and England, to the annual meeting in May.

Hon. J. Floyd King, who is a member of the association, made a most interesting address, showing the growing tendency of the Government to conserve to a greater extent than ever before the agricultural interests of the country. Mr. King offered resolutions requesting the Commissioner of Agriculture to deliver an address before the annual meeting in May, and also to make this association the medium for the distribution of seeds and plants for the Southwest, and what is most important of all, urging the Department of Agriculture to establish under the auspices of the association an experimental farm, similar to the tea farm established by that department in California.

"It will be remembered what a large and intelligent body of men attended the last annual meeting of this association, held in this city, about four hundred delegates being present, representing nearly 250,000 bales of cotton. As the association is doubly as large as it then was, and delegates are united from all the cotton States, as well as from manufacturers, the meeting in Memphis will be one of the most important ever held in the South.

Washington, March 17.—The Census Bureau has issued a bulletin giving in detail, the white and colored population of the United States. It shows a total white population of 43,404,876 and colored 6,577,151. The greatest proportion of colored to white is in South Carolina, where three-fifths of the whole are colored. In Louisiana and Mississippi from one-half to three-fifths are colored. In Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia and District of Columbia, one-third to one-half are colored, and in Arkansas and Tennessee from one-fourth to one-third are colored.

Outside of the former slave States the proportion of negroes is very small.

The relative changes in the negro population during the decade between 1870 and 1880 are also given. In the United States as a whole, there has been a gain of six hundred and twenty-five on an assumed basis of 100,000 whites.

Great relative gains have apparently been made in the former slave-holding States. Eight of these States have made gains ranging from 941 to nearly 11,000. It is believed, however, by the Census office that these apparent gains are due in a great measure to the imperfections of the census of 1870, and under the conditions which prevailed at that time it is probable a much larger proportion of the negroes were omitted than of whites.

South Carolina, Mississippi, North Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Tennessee and District of Columbia, show a relative increase, Texas and Florida take the lead of States which have lost; both of these States have received heavy white immigration from other parts of the country, which has more than overbalanced whatever gain in colored population may have been made. They have been the scene of rapid development, and thus the relative decrease of the blacks is to be accounted for not by exodus or dying out, but by infusion of whites. The movement of blacks in the Northern and Western States has apparently been of little comparative account, and the migration of negroes has not attained to such dimensions as to be perceptible there. Mississippi, Louisiana and North Carolina, States from which exodus principally took place, have all apparently gained heavily in relative proportion of blacks, while Kansas, to which the major part went, has lost in proportion to its increase in population, and Indiana has gained but slightly.

Chicago, March 18.—One of the fiercest storms of the season, began about daybreak. At first rain fell, but it quickly turned to snow, accompanied by a furious gale. In a few hours the streets were rendered as impassible as at any time during the winter. The storm was not very severe in the north, but extended west as far as Omaha, south to St. Louis and Kansas City, and east to Cresline.

Montgomery, Ala., March 21.—The Alabama River is at present higher than ever before known. No damage to the railroads as yet reported.

Washington, March 21.—The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have reported favorably the new Chinese treaty, but this is done partly as a matter of deference to the last committee, and partly to get the topic before Senate for prompt disposition.

The treaty will be very strongly opposed by the Democrats. It will come up to morrow in executive session and may consume the whole week.

FOREIGN.

St. Petersburg, March 14.—Dr. Drovlaeline, who was among the physicians first summoned to the Czar, immediately selected the necessary instruments for amputating the legs, which were held by the flesh only, the bones being broken. Blood flowed copiously from the lacerated wounds. Indian rubber bandages were first applied to the right leg, below the knee, and then to the left. The Czar's right hand, on which was a glove, was found to be greatly lacerated. His marriage ring was broken to pieces and driven into the flesh. The surgeons tied up the several arteries. At length, under the influence of sulphate of oxygen and ice, the Emperor opened his eyes and respiration became more apparent.

Chaplain B. Janor availed himself of the interval of apparent consciousness to administer the sacrament, and for a moment some hopes were entertained of the Czar's life, but a minute or two afterwards his heart had ceased to beat.

During the mad flurry of the the members of his family surrounded his bed. The Arch Priest recited prayers for those extremis, all present kneeling.

The spectacle was heart-rending.

Col. Dorrilsky is confined to his bed, but is not seriously injured.

The number of persons injured by the explosion is greater than was at first supposed. Several have since died.

Berlin, March 16.—In Government circles here, entire confidence is felt in the peaceful policy of the new Czar. It is stated that he will shortly issue a manifesto emphasizing his motto, "Peace and Economy," and declaring his intention to devote himself mainly to internal reform.

St. Petersburg, March 16. — The body of the dead Emperor was placed in its coffin to-day and conveyed to the great church of the palace. The Emperor and Grand Duke Vladimir bore the head of the coffin, and the other Grand Dukes and Princes of Luchtenburg and Oldenburg bore the foot and sides. The people in the halls knelt as the procession passed. On the arrival of the cortage at the church mass for the dead was celebrated. Regalia had been brought from Moscow and was conveyed through the streets in state.

Rome, March 17.—The Pope's Encyclical letter has been issued, proclaiming a jubilee from March 19 to November 1 for Europe, and to the end of the year for the rest of the world.

London, March 17.—At midnight a policeman on duty at the Mansion House, observed a fire on the ground, near the rear wall of the Lord Mayor's official residence, and found a wooden box with a fuse, connected to which some lighted paper had been recently applied. The officer extinguished the fire and took the box to the police station, where it was found to contain about forty pounds of gunpowder with the fuse in the midst of it. No arrests have been made, nor has any clue to the perpetrators been thus far discovered.

London, March 19.—A dispatch from St. Petersburg says: The leading idea at present urged, is said to be to do everything for agricultural interests represented by peasants and landed proprietors. All other sections—such as capitalists, manufacturers, scientists and literati—are regarded in certain quarters as more or less disaffected.

The following proposals are said to be under consideration: Imperial ukases to be issued on the Emperor's sole initiative, thus giving evidence of a firm purpose of his own will. Firstly, to promote intercolonization by the migration of peasants to rich unoccupied lands, funds being provided therefor; secondly, to give more land to peasants generally, and thirdly, to liberate peasants from expensive regime of passports.

London, March 21.—A dispatch to Reuter's Telegram Agency from Newcastle, dated to-day, says: It is rumored that the Boers have agreed to all the British conditions except the one requiring them to disarm.

As the armistice was to expire to-day, the British troops were held in readiness for an immediate advance. Much sickness exists in the Boer camp.

A later telegram says it is reported that the armistice has been prolonged for a fortnight.

St. Petersburg, March 21.—Newspapers report numerous arrests during the last few days. At the house of nine of the persons arrested, the police found 700,000 roubles. A man, upon whom were found arms, poison and 20,000 roubles, was arrested last night. It is stated that two dynamite stores have been discovered.

London, March 21. The Standard's St. Petersburg correspondent says: The Municipal Council are considering the advisability of establishing a system of supervision accompanied by domiciliary visits over every house in the city.

The News' St. Petersburg correspondent says: In consequence of the laxity of authorities with regard to the discovery of the mine near the new Czar's residence, a court of inquiry has been instituted.

Cypress trees have been planted around the spot where the Czar fell, and sacred pictures with lamps burning before them have been placed there.

The correspondent adds: I have reason to believe that the Emperor continues to appreciate the conciliatory tendency of Gen. Melikoff, and that at present no extraordinary measures of repression are contemplated.

The Council of Ministers have decided to proceed immediately with convocation of the commissions to consider representation of the people on State questions.

University of Louisiana.

COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES AND CONFERRING OF DIPLOMAS.

Athens, Thursday March 17, the forty-seventh annual commencement exercises of the medical department of the University of Louisiana, took place at the Grand Opera House, New Orleans. The magnificent entrance was lined with shrubs and flowers.

The members of the Reception Committee attended to the comforts of the guests, and their efforts to accommodate the visitors were greatly appreciated.

The members of the faculty, President Hunt of the University, Judge Kennard and other members of the Board of Administrators, Justices Todd, Levy and Fenner, of the Supreme Court, Mayor Shakspeare, Gen. Beauregard, Mr. Ed. Fenner, Dr. De Roulhac and a large number of doctors of divinity and medicine, occupied chairs on the stage, which was also prettily decorated. The young gentleman who were to be awarded the diplomas, for which they had so earnestly and faithfully studied, occupied the first row of seats in the parquette.

Before the commencement of the exercise the orchestra rendered several delightful selections.

Rev. Dr. Jas. K. Gutheim then advanced and delivered an eloquent and learned prayer.

The salutatory address of Rev. B. M. Palmer, D.D., was a masterly composition, and was attentively listened to.

Hon. Randolph Hunt, LL.D., President of the university, then conferred the degrees mentioned upon the following graduates:

This proceeding was supplemented by Prof. T. G. Richardson, Dean of the Faculty, who presented the diplomas to the young men in a few appropriate and feeling remarks.

After the playing of a waltz by Stranss, Luther Sexton, M.D., upon whom had been conferred the honor of the valedictorian, advanced and delivered his address. Mr. Sexton was very eloquent, and his remarks were greeted with long and frequent applause. At the conclusion of his splendid effort, he was overwhelmed with floral tokens, and was warmly congratulated by all of the gentleman on the platform.

Rev. J. O'B. Lowry pronounced a benediction upon the audience, the orchestra began playing a galop, and the young doctors received the congratulations of their relatives and acquaintances. Ere the strains of the joyful music died away the audience began to disperse.—New Orleans Picayune.

HANDY.

BY ORLANDO PROCTOR.

I'm willing to go West who for love's sake
Will go with me with earnest will
Yet like who take for love's sweet sake
Thanks, I hold more generous still.

I love to see the noble mind
That freely some great wrong forgives;
Yet nobler is the one forgiven
Who bears that burden well and lives.

I may be hard to gain, and still
Yet keep a lowly, steadfast heart
Yet he who loses his is ill
A burden and a drag apart.

Glorious it is to wear the crown
Of deserved and pure success;
He who knows how to fail has won
A crown whose lustre is not less.

So it may be he who can command
And rule with just and steady sway,
Yet is divinest wisdom taught
Better by him who's ruled to-day.

Blessed are they who die for God
And earn the martyr's crown of light
Yet he who lives for God may be
A greater conqueror in his sight.

Plagiarism.

It has been well said that absolute originality of thought is rare. Indeed in the strictest sense it does not exist at all, since a rigid elimination of the term would exclude the most remote suggestiveness even through the ordinary natural channels of thought. The current conception of legitimate originality, however, does not err on the side of rigor. Public or "quasi private" sentiment grants a broad range of literary acquisition and use. This is a day of licensed borrowing. It is the age of the cyclopedia and the translated classics.

Yet men transgress even this wide margin. With all the prevailing leniency of conscience and of circumstance, plagiarism still exists.

I. Conscious intentional plagiarism. Its guilt need not here be discussed. It is as specious as the theft of property. It is a palpable violation of the moral law, and when practiced to a serious extent, should be liable to civil penalty. The difficulty in condemning it, lies in its discovery. The sneaking meanness which perpetrates it, generally effects concealment. Plagiarists retain social and literary standing because they are not known.

The press affords good scope for this practice. The exchange table is covered with papers which the subscriber will never see. Their columns are filled with the leaders on fresh themes. It is so much easier to borrow than to create. Strangely enough, I hold two fate-papers in my hand which afford a case in point. The two seldom fall into the same hands therefore is it thus. A prominent Southern secular journal sends a special reporter to a distant State capital, to write up important events there transpiring. I have his (?) letter as published in the paper for which he writes, but in a leading daily of the city from which he writes and dated one day before his letter, the same account is printed sentence after sentence, with literal identity.

The political speaker finds no lack of opportunity nor of temptation to plagiarize.

Modern poetry bears repented testimony to the guilt of its authors.

It might also be noticed in this connection that musical plagiarism is not unusual. Descending from general statement to particular examples I could name two simple, familiar airs, the one of which is a mere transcription of the other. The entire conception of the two pieces is the same. New divisions are made, the rhythm is modified, the cadence changed, new words string along the line, a rattling chorus is attached, and lo, a new tune!

Sin will issue, however, from a fountain of morals no higher than the level of humanity, and therefore we are not surprised at the commission of theft by even the loftiest lives of merely worldly action. But it is a source of unfailing wonder that this sinful habit should invade the sacred pulpit. Yet the eye of some one will read these lines who has preached, and perhaps preaches, the thoughts of others as his own. Let him take heed. "Thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal?" Surely a plagiarizing preacher is inconsistent, in more ways than one. God has called him, if indeed he has, to preach—him and not another. His own personal individuality, sanctified by grace, cultivated and prepared by earnest personal effort, is the limit of God's requirement at his hands. How can a preacher consecrate a stolen sermon to God in prayer? How can he expect the blessing and unction of the Holy One in its delivery? How can he reconcile it with the voice of awakened conscience?

Prominent preachers have been guilty concerning this thing. At the session of an Annual Conference, several years ago, a D. D., and a member of the General Conference, when appointed to preach to the large Conference congregation, had the hardihood and effrontery to repeat verbatim one of Talmage's freshly published sermons. Only two brethren detected him in this rash folly. Yet what must have been his own feelings during the solemn hour!

All plagiarism is not thus bold and entire. A less complete, though scarcely less guilty form, consists in borrowing thots and cloaking them under a new drapery of words and arrangement.

Indeed it is not necessary to write, to print nor to speak in public in order to plagiarize, though these are the usual means. A still milder form prevails in ordinary conversation. Silly puns, and trite comparisons, second handed plans of work and old lines of thought, criticisms on the past and prophecies for the future, are all palmed off as original.

II. Unconscious, unintentional plagiarism.

Large readers, whose minds have retentive memories, but poor digestive organs, have been known to reproduce in willingly entire and lengthy trains of thought, retaining even verbal exactness.

Large writers, with poor memories and poorer methods, have innocently written page after page of quoted matter in the firm belief that they were giving to the world the offspring of their own brains.

It is unnecessary to mention the minor oversights, typographical errors, and the like which frequently appear in the publication of elaborate matter freighted with references and quotations.

This plagiarism may seem to exist where really there is none at all. Minds of similar mold, similarly circumstanced and drawing suggestions from a common source, have naturally produced similar works. Remarkable coincidences of this kind abound in the world of letters. The following is an example. Thomas Moore, in the preface to two poems on Corruption and Intolerance, beautifully compared the mind of a partisan judge to the pupil of the human eye. "Demore fight you your mind, the more it contracts." These poems were published in 1808. Fifty years later, a prominent American author made exactly the same comparison in a public speech which was highly complimented. Yet, but for no recollection of having read this preface, even after it was shown him.

Quotation marks and paged references are not necessary to avoid the charge of plagiarism. All literary material has its legitimate use. This use is admirably explained and thoroughly understood.

Modern treatises, speaking against this literary piracy, stress the lament of minister to the person thus robbed. They should look higher. It is a sin not only unforgiven, but untold. It should be relegated to by the accidental observance of literary courtesy and custom, but to the more searching behests and deeper obligations of the right.

A safe test rule: Never borrow from an author to any extent nor in any manner which you would not be willing for him and your audience or readers to know.

D. A. STONE.

A Plea for Old Men.

BY R. H. ROVERS, D. D.

I do not believe that age, per se, should have anything to do with a man's claims, to respect, to office, or to emolument. No man has any lease of his life. The young often precede the old to the great beyond. Bishop Marvin was one of the youngest men belonging to the Episcopal Board; still he was the first called away. Bishop Paine was older by ten years than Bishop Doggett. Age is no recommendation to office, and at the same time it should form no objection. No man in the church could have served the church as the Book Agent with more success than Dr. McFerrin, and he is more than seventy years old. It would be hard to supply the place of Dr. Summers, and he is little less than three score and ten.

Chancellor Tillman is filling the highest place in the department of classic education, and yet he has lived quite the allotted time of man. Age itself does not qualify man for position, it does not disqualify him. I would not vote for a man for any place of profit and trust simply because he was old; I would not refuse to vote for him simply because he was old. The question should be "Is this now the man for this place?" If so put him in it. So long as a man is able to do efficient work he ought to be put in the place to which he is best fitted. If at the next General Conference Dr. McFerrin is as strong and healthful as now, he might well be continued in the Book Agency, or be exalted to the Episcopate. I do not think he or any other man should be turned out simply because he is old. The question to be asked always is this: At the present time is this man the most suited of all available men for the vacant place? If he is let him fill it, irrespective of his age.

Some men have done the greatest work of their lives when they were old. They have studied. They have written. They have preached with great power. Mr. Wesley continued his efficient work to a very advanced age. Bancroft, the historian, is still writing at the age of eighty. Bishop Kavanaugh is preaching with all the vigor of his early manhood, and he is approaching eighty. A lazy, croaking, effete old man is fit for no place, and must, of course, be placed among the superannuated.

Said a gentleman to me, himself worthy of any position: We should not elect any man to a certain office unless he has fifteen or twenty years of good work in him. We do not know how many years any man may live. We can not tell how long any man can work. Bishop Bascom died before he had completed one quadrennium, while his seniors are still alive.

A Bishop desired minds to give to a certain gentleman an appointment for which he thought him well suited. The only objection urged was that he was too old. The brother was efficient, earnest, capable, but too; he was too old. Had he been inefficient, incapable, or unsuited to the appointment, he should not have had it. But justice, charity and truth all forbade his being set aside, simply because he was old.

Utilize old men. Let them do all the work for which they are capable. It is a grand sight: an old man with ripe experience, earnest spirit, loving heart, and unflagging energy, devoting himself to constant and efficient work for the master. Let us help him. Let not even a straw be thrown in his way. Let no discouraging words be spoken, no opposing act be done, by one of God's servants, whether young or old.

When the great Dr. Winans was compelled to ask for a superannuated relation, Bishop Paine said: Brethren, Dr. Winans presents to us a glorious sight. He is like the sun, gently declining, in full orbed splendor, his round of rays complete. So the grand old man never appeared to greater advantage than now. He utters no complaint. He indulges no murmurings. He goes on the retired list with as sublime a tread as he ever went to a station or district.

So let us follow our old men, when age or any thing else may disqualify them for efficiency. Dr. Wadsworth never rose to better advantage, than he did, at our last Conference, when in his own peculiar manner he asked to be placed on the superannuated list. Never did his words impress me more than the tender utterances which placed him on the retired list. It was severe work and not age that demanded the rest which I trust will thoroughly restore him to the regular work.

Croaking age is hateful. Wise, gentle, loving age is a crown of glory to man or woman. Vicious age is despicable. Virtuous age is worthy all honor, and claims the highest respect of the good and true.

"That Pint Law Again."

The "Pint Law" passed by the last Legislature of Mississippi has worked only even within the circle of my observation, embracing four or five counties in the Northeastern corner of the State. The facts in the case are against the theories of Judge T. L. Mellen. He may have voted for the bill and have spoken in its favor but that does not make it right or for the best. "Prohibition may not prohibit" but certainly no limited license will not tribute. The pint law has turned the whisky demon loose in many towns where drunkenness and drunkenness were almost unknown, and with pint shops at nearly every cross roads in which whisky was not sold before that law went into force. While no whisky was sold the State docket did not occupy twelve hours time of the court, but now it takes five days to get through with the State docket, and even then many cases have to lie over for the want of time to try them. Fifty eight true bills were found at the last term of the court, and fifty three of them had their origin in or about these pint shops. We could say sharp things, as Judge Mellen did in his reply to Gadsby, but we prefer to stick to the facts in the case. Many grand juries in various parts of the State have referred to the pint law as the cause of an increase of crime in the State. But perhaps these reports were only "Apostolic blows and knocks" by men who would martyr themselves to the last legislature or gather the present legislature. We know there were no prisoners on some of these grand juries. The pint law has worked evil and caused an increase of crime, or these men are grossly mistaken. In my town I saw but one drunken man in two years, but since two pint shops have been opened through the influence and vote of Judge Mellen and others, I see four or five drunken men nearly every week. The intent of the law may be good, I can't say, I am no lawyer, and the purpose of the law-makers may have been good but, the practical working of the law is evil, and only evil, and that continually. Even one so blind as a preacher can see that much. "Good Gospel preaching" is a great power, but nearly useless to men who can get as much whisky as they want. We would not "dragoon men into reformation," but we do deprecate the increased facility for dissipation. I have seen several members of the legislature, and heard from a number of others, but Judge Mellen is the first one that I have heard of who voted for the pint law. Those we have met have pleaded to be absent at the particular moment when that bill passed. But why did Judge Mellen speak in its favor and vote for it? To get into the rollers of the State the "privilege tax on the sale of whisky and to prevent false swearing?" That is to keep men from committing one wrong he will hire out the privilege of another. Why not license men to commit murder and steal? Why not hire out the privilege of selling opium and morphine? These things will be done, law or no law. Why not approve them and afford every facility for them to be carried on? Is the privilege tax on the sale of whisky were applied to the building of jails, asylums, and "penitentiaries" there would be an appropriateness in the direction of that tax.

I am opposed to the pint law, and in favor of prohibition. Grumpy.

A Convert from Romanism.

The Rev. E. M. Susseville, pastor of Holding Mission Church, Rochester, New York, recently gave before a crowded audience in that city, a narrative of his conversion, which was reported in the Rochester Morning Herald as follows:

I was born in Montreal, of French Roman Catholic parents, and was brought up in that belief. My mother had a great desire to have me become a priest, and I was sent to college with this end in view when quite young. In due time I entered the seminary connected with this institution. Shortly, however, I left the seminary, telling my mother that I did not like it, and was determined to work in a store, which I did for a few years. I then learned the art of wood engraving, and became a first-class workman. My boss sent me to Ottawa to do some work for the Government. While there I again determined to become a priest, but, on returning to Montreal, in a few weeks I became acquainted with a priest from Pocolo, who was a most vulgar and impure-minded man. This shook my faith considerably, and led to grave doubts as to the Catholic religion. He left soon, but his example had a bad effect on me, and I became disgusted with Christianity as I knew it then, and I asked myself whether the doctrines of the Catholic religion were believed by the priests, and my doubts were strong. I went to work in the Witness office, and when I had been there three weeks I made a confession, but the priest told me that I could not be absolved unless I gave up working for a Protestant paper. This I would not do, for I had to support my mother and sister. Time passed on till the 12th day of July, 1877, the day on which the Orangemen had a large picnic, and only a few remained in the city to attend a service held on St. James street. That morning when I went to work I was a Catholic, as I was when I returned to dinner, but when I came back to tea, I was not. The reasons for this change were that I witnessed the brutal murder of young Hackett, being not more than twenty feet from him when he was shot down. Even when he was lying there the infuriated mob were not satisfied, but fired at him while he was dying. I asked myself if these could be men. This was the crowd to which I belonged. They were Roman Catholics and sportsmen, and I was one of them. But my whole soul revolted, and I said that I would not be one of them. If this was religion I wanted none of it, and I begged my mother and my friends not to call me a Catholic again. About three weeks previous to this event discussions had arisen between a young lady working in the office, a Methodist, and one of the young men, a Catholic. In these he was always worsted, for the reason that she always quoted the Scriptures which he could not answer. I had never seen a Bible, so that I knew nothing of the Scriptures. She asked me if I had ever seen the Bible, and upon my saying no, she gave me hers and asked me to read it, if for no other reason, as a history. I took it home, and putting it in my trunk had not seen it since. I did not think of it again until this time. About half past eight on the morning of July 12, I sat in my room thinking of the events of the day, and wishing that I could find some means to enlighten myself in regard to religion, when I suddenly thought of the Bible in my trunk. I took it out and opening at the New Testament, began to read. How beautiful I found it, how attractive and simple, but so sublime, so grand and clear. I read until 2 o'clock, and had perused the four Gospels and part of the Apostles. I found nothing here of the doctrines I had been taught; no cardinals, no pope, and made up my mind that the Church of Rome was not the Church of Christ. I was down-hearted and saddened, for I knew not which way to turn, and kneeling down I prayed that I might find the Saviour and I might be assured that I was forgiven. Suddenly I felt the burden lifted from my shoulders, my heart was filled with joy, and I knew that my prayer was answered. Of course, I met great opposition from my former friends when I said that I had renounced the Catholic religion and my mother was made ill by the failure of her cherished hope to see me a priest. On the next Sunday I went to a Methodist chapel, where I watched the service closely, and was deeply impressed with the simplicity yet sublimity of it all. About two years ago I felt that God called me to preach the gospel, and went to college to prepare myself for this work. I came to this city on Sept. 1, intending to stay but a few weeks, but I received a call from this congregation, and have determined to stay here, and with God's help, work hard to reclaim the erring, and turn them toward the right way.

The Pall Mall Gazette, London, says: "Later accounts from the mouth of the Congo speak favorably of the progress which is being made by Mr. Stanley in his great undertaking of constructing a road past the falls that separate the upper and lower river. Her majesty's consuls at Loanda recently visited Vivi, the permanent station established by Stanley at the Yellala Falls; it is on an elevated plateau overlooking the river, and has all the appearance of a small town. It contains, besides the residence of Mr. Stanley, dwelling houses for his European staff, workshops, warehouses and huts for his laborers, and a garden producing vegetables of almost every description. From this point about thirty miles of road has been constructed, about twelve feet wide, suitable for carts and wagons, a supply of which, with twenty donkeys, has recently arrived from Europe. The consul reports that a very large trade is now being carried on on the Lower Congo by various firms, Dutch, French, English, and Portuguese. Their headquarters are at Banana creek, at the mouth of the river, where between thirty and forty vessels call annually. The consul ascended the river to within twelve miles of Vivi in H. M. S. Firefly, and it is thought that vessels might easily do the remaining distance. There seems every likelihood that Mr. Stanley will be able to accomplish his enormous undertaking and render accessible a magnificent waterway into the interior of Africa of about one thousand miles in length, thus giving an immeasurable impetus to the development of the resources of the continent."

Monroe, La.

MR. EDITOR: I arrived on my work January 4, 1881; found snow about four inches deep; followed by continuous cold and rain until March. I have had a kind reception, and have entered on my work in earnest, trusting in God. I have made nearly two hundred pastoral visits, praying with the families nearly every time. I have preached twenty-one sermons, baptized six children and one adult, and received nine persons into the church. Congregations large and attentive. We are holding some class meetings. Sabbath schools are in a moderate condition. We have let the contract for building our church in Monroe, and expect to occupy the house in July. We will have a neat house of worship, thirty-five by sixty feet. Leases are prevailing generally in Monroe. We have buried two children, the first the babe of Bro. James T. Strother, the second, Lee, eldest son of Bro. Oglesby Smith, late of Shreveport. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Yours in Christ,

SPRING CREEK CIRCUIT, LA., March 21.—Good news from Spring Creek circuit, Louisiana Conference. We have just closed our first Quarterly Conference. The presiding elder, Bro. Hocutt, was at his post, in the Spirit of the Master. He gave us two good sermons, after which six children were dedicated to the Lord by baptism, and thirteen persons were received by letter. We have commenced this morning to build a parsonage.

HOLMESVILLE, MISS., March 22.—Circuit all in peace and pressing forward. Sunday-schools reviving, or coming out of winter quarters; farmers very busy planting; all very backward; rain plenty; a little too cold for young corn. A very large quantity of cattle and sheep have died in this country. Health good, many good.

I found in Him a resting place,
And he has made me glad."

Death is the harmless thing that a poor shepherd suffered yesterday, or a maid-servant to-day; and at the same time in which you die, in that very night a thousand creatures die with you, some wise men and many fools; and the wisdom of the first does not quiet him, and the folly of the latter does not enable him to die.

Jeremy Taylor.

When death, the great reconciler, has come, it is never our tenderness that we repent of, but our severity. This we should alway bear in mind, and by keeping bitter words from our lips, drive them from our hearts. Love we can never repent, but hate may till all our lives with bitterness. Then let us cultivate love, which is the "charity" of Christian good-will.

Nature has placed mankind under the government of two sovereign masters, pain and pleasure. It is for them alone to point out what we ought to do as well as determine what we shall do. On the one hand stand all the right and wrong; on the other the chain of causes and effects are fastened to their throne.

Better that our eyes should fail with looking upward, than that they should be ever bent on the earth, on the dark dust of its sorrow or the glittering dust of its vanity.

The immorality of the age says one, is with some men a standing topic of complaint. But if any one likes to be moral I can see nothing in the age to prevent him.

We make the greater part of the evil circumstances in which we are placed; and then fit ourselves for those circumstances by a process of degradation.

It is not so much the great sins that take the freshness from our conscience, as the numberless petty faults which we are all the while committing.

THE SAINT'S ETERNAL HOME.

This groaning earth's too dark and drear,
For the saint's eternal home,
But a city from heaven will soon appear;
We know that the moment is drawing near
When she in her beauty shall come.
Her gates of pearl we soon shall see,
Her music we soon shall hear;
Joyous and bright will that moment be,
We'll walk in the shadows of life's fair tree,
With the Saviour forever near.

We would gladly exchange a world like this,
Where death triumphant reigns,
For our beautiful home in that land of bliss,
Where all is happiness, joy and peace,
Where nothing can enter that pains.
There'll be no sorrow nor night,
For the darkness shall flee away,
And the crucified Lamb is its glorious light,
And the saints shall walk with him in white
In that eternal home.

O! there the loved on earth shall meet,
Whom death hath sundered here,
Prophets and patriarchs there shall greet,
And all shall worship at Jesus' feet,
And no separation shall fear.
Though sorrow and grief await us here,
Our conflicts will soon be o'er,
This glorious hope our hearts shall cheer,
We know that the Saviour will soon appear,
And then we shall suffer no more.

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN KEENER.

Second Quarter Lesson II.

GOLDEN TEXT. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Lev. xix, 18.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1881.—LUKE x, 25-37.

25. And, behold, a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?

26. He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou?

27. And he, answering, said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself.

28. And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live.

29. But he, willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbor?

30. And Jesus, answering, said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.

31. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way: and when he saw him he passed by on the other side.

32. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side.

33. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him he had compassion on him,

34. And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him.

35. And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee.

36. Which now of these three thinkest thou was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves?

37. And he said, He that showed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go and do thou likewise.

While Jesus was attending the Feast of Tabernacles at Jerusalem, about six months before his death, a certain scribe, who was learned in the law, undertook to puzzle the great Teacher with a great question. His manner of approach and address would have us believe that he was merely testing the Master, proving him with a hard question. The sequel, however, shows us that this lawyer was there for information he much needed, and not merely to measure swords with this great Teacher. We have known proud and conceited men use this stratagem to gain some much-desired information; too proud to confess their ignorance, by asking directly, they put their questions in a disinterested spirit, as if for mere argument's sake.

A certain lawyer stood up to tempt him; but do not think that this lawyer was after the style and pattern of our lawyers of the present day. The name had a better significance and higher meaning, by so much as they studied and practiced a better code. Their law books were the Scriptures, the Books of Moses and the prophets, inspired law that needed not continual revising and amending. This lawyer was what we would call a doctor of divinity, like our Dr. Parker, the editor of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. He is a scribe, learned in the law, and, had he lived in those days, they would have called him a lawyer.

This lawyer's question is the greatest that can be asked, and it is propounded to the One only man who could fully answer it. We are all personally interested in this question and answer, for we all must, soon or late, ask the same question to the same Person, for to whom else shall we go? "thou hast the words of eternal life." The motive which prompted this lawyer to ask was not altogether ignoble.

The question sprung out of a conscious but unadmitted need in this man's soul.

He was a lawyer; the Scriptures were his study. He was familiar with all the precepts and statutes of the law. He knew the law but imperfectly; but, alas! well enough to feel that it condemned him. The more he studied those exceeding broad commandments the more he felt his inability to keep that law. He felt that if eternal life was conditioned upon his keeping this law in violate that eternal life was an impossibility to him. He felt that it must be by some other way than perfect obedience. He seemed to think that salvation was half his own merits, and half the mercy of God supplementing his shortcomings and defects.

He seemed to recognize the appropriateness of repentance for sinners and publicans, but the idea of his needing repentance he had never entertained; but there was something to be done, if he ever reached heaven, something besides keeping that law. What is it? He was wise in going to Christ, for he only could answer and tell him that something to be done. Our need, though we be unconscious of it, makes us eloquent. This lawyer's question shows great ignorance of the law's profound reach and depth, but it also shows much sincerity springing out of a want the lawyer was too proud to confess.

"Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" This question is so appropriate to human lips and human need, so portentious and pertinent that it ever arouses the attention of Heaven; it is so much in order that no matter how or who asks it, it always evokes a clear and full response from him who has the words of eternal life. It is an interesting study to seek out the different answers given to this question of questions, for it was asked often and answered often; the answers are different, but yet amounting to the same result. We refer you to an answer given to this question by the Holy Ghost, through Paul, to the jailer at Philippi—Acts xvi, 30. This was an instance of an immediate answer, and an illustration of the question asked in the best spirit. The answer to this question varies according to the faith of the questioner. The answer is directest to the greatest faith. This lawyer's answer was a revelation of the first step in the way of salvation, while the jailor's answer was the last step in the same way.

Verse 26. The answer. What is written in the law? how readest thou? In the Bible you are to find your answer, not in nature, nor by revelations from the departed, not from angels, but from the Bible. The lawyer is quick to answer; he knew the law, maybe these very words were embroidered on the phylacteries of the robe he wore, the very words he answered. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself. "Thou hast answered right; do this and thou shalt live." The answer was a surprise and disappointment to the lawyer—do this. That's just what I cannot do; that's my difficulty. I have not kept this law; this law has been the cause of my uneasiness. By the knowledge of this law is sin. The more he learned the law the more he learned how far he was from really doing the law. By the law is the knowledge of sin.

The law, this law he had just so glibly quoted, this epitome of all law, because it is love in action, and love is the fulfilling of that law, does not justify him, and, wishing to be justified, he attempts to justify himself by showing that he had fulfilled this law of love in so far as any had claims on him, and asks the question: Who is my neighbor? The Lord answers his question by the parable of the Good Samaritan, to show him that his question is out of order, because it is not a question of love. The very question discovers him to be ignorant of the nature of that law of love of which they were talking. When he would draw a line to mark off neighbors from others, he showed that he knew nothing of that love which has no line that it cannot pass, no point at which cabins on it cease.

The real question is not who is my neighbor, but who am I neighbor to? The true neighbor is he who links himself to others by acts of neighborly love and friendly sympathy. Not place, but love makes neighborhood. Love makes China our neighbor. Christ turns his question round, and puts it right, and then the answer is plain, and he makes the lawyer answer it. Who was neighbor unto him? He that showed mercy on him. "Go thou and do likewise." The question is answered. Mark the correspondence between this answer to the lawyer and the rich young ruler; the Master gave him something to do, sell all thou hast, and come and follow me. Here is the "go and do" again. Mark the answer the Holy Spirit gave the jailer at Philippi: Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Nicodemus was answered when he came to learn the way: "Ye must be born again;" "he that believeth not is condemned already." You see there is justification of works as well as of faith. This lesson is the gospel of works. The gospel of faith is the gospel of work; go and do. A faith that goes not and does not is dead.

Am I then to take this for an answer to the question? Yes, exactly this. Then am I to understand that by being a good neighbor, and loving my brother, I am to get to heaven? You are to understand that if you do not do this you will certainly fail. This law of love to your fellow is the first step in the way of life eternal. Seek God, our Father, has made the forgiving us of our sins to depend upon our forgiving our fellowmen their sins against us, and there can be no forgiveness without love. "If any man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen."

If men are unfaithful to the duties which grow out of the inferior relations sustained between man and man, how much less are they to be expected to meet and fulfill the obligation of their higher relationship to God.

The law of love, love God and love your neighbor, must be obeyed in a reverse order to its heavenly sequement. We are on earth, and must take hold of the lowest link in this chain of love let down to us. Begin by loving man. Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there remember est that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift, before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

The order of the work of salvation is, first, be true to yourself, then be true to your fellow, and then you are ready to get right with God. And this commandment have we from him: That he that loveth God love his brother also.

Union Springs District, Alabama Conference.

MR. EDITOR: At the close of my first round, I desire to make a short report. Nearly all this district is new territory to me. To explore a new field, such a winter as this has been, is no child's play; besides, I have been in deep waters, more difficult to cross than those which have flooded the land and raised the streams in the bounds of my district. But the Lord has been a very present help in this my time of trouble. I am pleased with my district.

The resources of this district are very fine, much greater than I had supposed. The people, in the main, are in a prosperous condition. There are signs of prosperity in all the towns, as well as in the country. Some of the best farming lands in Alabama are in the bounds of this district; and other lands, which have been regarded poor, are now producing fine crops under the stimulus of commercial fertilizers. Land that would produce three hundred pounds of seed cotton per acre is made to produce from seven hundred to one thousand pounds of lint cotton per acre. These experiments in fertilizing are bringing about a new departure in farming. The future of this part of the State is brighter now than ever before, at least than it has been since the war.

The preachers are all at their post, and are doing faithful work. Those who had to move felt the full force of the cold which came on the last of December and the first of January. My sympathies have been stirred in behalf of those preachers and their families who had to not only move through the cold, but found a dilapidated parsonage, or no parsonage at all, at the end of their journey. O! when will our people wake up to the fact that parsonages are a part of the itinerant contract a necessary adjunct to the itinerancy!

The official members, in the main, have been present, and the stewards have made reasonable assessments for their pastors. I am favorably impressed with the spirit and bearing of every official board I have met. With such a corps of laymen to manage the finances of the district, and to lead in every good work, I am hopeful of great results. With one or two exceptions, the finances have come up well on the first round.

My predecessors on this district have done faithful work, much of the fruits of which is yet to be gathered. Such men as Dr. Joseph B. Cottrell, the Rev. James W. Shores, the Rev. Simon P. Richardson and Dr. O. R. Blue form a quartette that would be likely to run the entire scale of Christian duty, and strike every note in theology during a term of service of some twelve years; and, if all the reports be true, they certainly did run this scale and strike each one of these notes, to say nothing of unnumbered variations and unremembered preludes and interludes which came in here and there. But each man had his special gifts, and each one performed a work that possibly no one but he could have done. They have passed on to other fields, but their works abide, and in the great day they will receive their reward.

The congregations have been unusually large, considering the severity of the winter. In many places this is true of the Saturday service as well as that on Sunday. The visible results of each service showed that something deeper than idle curiosity had brought the people to the house of God. Nearly every pastor in the district preaches to large, attentive congregations, such congregations as should, and doubtless do, stir the soul and kindle the zeal of the preacher who ministers to them in holy things.

The Greenville Collegiate Institute, under the presidency of Rev. R. S. Holcombe, A. M., is doing a good work. The splendid new brick building is completed, and is now being occupied by the school. The building is 90x70 feet, and two stories high, the second story being occupied by the president, with ample room for thirty or forty boarding pupils. The building is substantial in structure, beautiful in the style of architecture, and convenient in its plan and appointments. Bro. Holcombe deserves great credit for the persistent and successful manner in which he has carried forward this noble work. The building is not only an ornament to Greenville, but it meets a long-felt want in this part of the Conference. The want of such a building has been a great drawback to the school ever since its establishment; but now, with this want supplied, and with President Holcombe at the helm, the Greenville Collegiate Institute has an open sea, and, with fair winds, will reach the gulf stream of prosperity. Already the currents are running in that direction. To those who want to give their children a good, solid, practical education, at a very reasonable cost, we heartily recommend this institution. Let those who come within the range of its patronage, and for whose benefit all this outlay of money and talent is being made, see that these halls are filled with students.

A Popular Ministry.

The estimate of a person is usually made up from what people think of him; so it is in regard to the ministry, but this way does not always hold good. Public sentiment is as fallible as an individual person. It is reliable only in proportion to the number and strength of the good people within its limits, notwithstanding some are so credulous in regard to this as to contend that whatever is customary is right. A man may be influenced by public opinion (and of course every man is to some extent) and be right, but, if he is controlled by it, he is not worthy of trust, simply because he is right only when public sentiment is right, and when it is wrong he is wrong. In regard to the ministry, it is not successful just because it is popular, and this is something that very many people, even in the church, ought to learn. If all the people attending upon the ministry are good people, truly converted to God, and that ministry is sound in doctrine and spirit, and is then popular, no reasonable objection can be raised. Any man in the ministry is trifling with it if he is only seeking public favor, and this certainly can be obtained by pursuing a consistent course in this matter. Many have done this, and received their reward. "How do you like your preacher?" and "How do you like your work?" are questions that are very frequently asked now days. There can be certainly no objection to the questions in themselves, but it does really appear that these inquiries are often made to open up the way for a discussion in regard to the merits or demerits of the preacher, and also of his work, with no good end in view.

The very thing that suggested this article to the mind of the writer chiefly is the fact that a great many now in the church speak and act as if their salvation is conditioned upon their liking the preacher, and on being pleased with the way the affairs of the church are managed. There can be found members, and not a few of them, that have not been to church in a long time. Ask the cause, and the answer is, "I do not like the preacher," or "I am not pleased with the state of things in the church." All that are much advanced in their Christian course can see that this is all for the lack of spirituality; that if such ever had religion at all they are backslidden in heart.

Paul, writing to the Corinthian Church, when it was in a low spiritual state, asked the question: "Is it so that there is not a wise man among you?" How unreasonable some people are for the want of spirituality! A man, who appeared to be very intelligent and dignified, once said to this writer, when he had just entered into a new charge: "You must please the people, or you will accomplish no good." The very idea of such a thing is ridiculous. What a disgusting sight it would be for a preacher to be going around making an effort to please everybody! Were he to do this it would be impossible to subscribe greater hypocrisy. A preacher should not have a disposition to please or displease, only for men's edification, but to do his duty, and God is glorified in what follows, and the preacher then "rejoices in himself alone, and not in another." It is the duty of every minister to "seek for the lost, and, to do this effectually, he must follow the apostle's direction "condescend to men of low estate;" but there is a sense in which he must not come down, but must hold himself up. He must not, for the sake of a little popularity with the men of the world, lower himself to the sacrificing of his ministerial dignity. In getting men out of the "horrible pit," he must be careful to keep his feet upon sound ground while he is doing this.

There is a great deal of ministerial popularity that is peculiarly dangerous, and it is to be feared that there is getting to be much of this kind. How is it possible for a preacher to be popular with impenitent, ungodly men? For he must publicly and privately, and with all his heart, condemn their course, and how can they be pleased? It is impossible for them to be. It is a great blessing for any preacher or any Christian, when in the line of duty, to be unpopular with the enemies of truth, and, on this account, the Saviour himself gives full liberty to all such to "rejoice and be exceeding glad."

Obituaries.

MISS LIZZIE SIBLEY died March 1, 1881, in the thirty-fourth year of her age, at the residence of her brother-in-law, Mr. C. C. Gibson, Magnolia, Miss.

The subject of this notice had premonitory symptoms of pulmonary disease while she was in her youthful days, and although she lived to an average life time, she was the greater part of the time a sufferer. She seldom mentioned her sufferings, and if the cough had not revealed her condition, a stranger might have thought she was in good health. For more than twenty years, perhaps, the disease was developing, and so stealthy in its progress that the beauty of womanhood, in form and features, did not depart from her until a short time before the spirit took its flight. Since the death of her sister, Nannie Gibson, with whom she was living, she had charge of the household affairs of the family. She was an excellent housekeeper, and took pleasure in attending to the wants of the family in the line of domestic duties appropriately belonging to her; gently and cheerfully guiding the children and servants who were about her; and keeping everything in proper order. She managed her affairs with quietness, and if anything was troublesome she exercised patience.

In the providence of God her life was spent in circumstances which enabled her to obtain what was needful for her without anxiety on her part. Her chief concern about temporal things was to make a wise use of what she had, and although she manifested an interest in whatever concerned the public, she entered most heartily into benevolent enterprises.

She joined the church in Magnolia, by profession, in August, 1874, and continued a consistent member until her death. Her health began to fail last year more rapidly than ever before, and she concluded to visit her relations in Texas, thinking the change might improve her health, or if it did not she would see her people once more before she died. Her health did not improve in Texas, and she came back to Magnolia in December last. It was evident that she was approaching the end, and the decline was hastening the final issue. She was aware of her condition, but exercised the same control over her expressions that had characterized her speech for years past. Finally, but a few days before her death, she began to give instructions in regard to her burial, and other things necessary to be done, at the same time expressing a willingness and readiness to go. She talked freely about death as she saw the day approaching. At one time the family and friends thought she was dying, and she told them she was. She said: "If this is death it is nothing to die." She was firm in her trusting the Lord, and confident that she was going to heaven. She had a message for each member of the family, which she delivered tenderly and touchingly, telling them to meet her in heaven. At last it appeared that sleep had come to set the prisoner free, and as it came softly taking her rest she fell asleep in Jesus. May it please the Lord to make her humble life and triumphant death the means of leading some to the faith of the gospel of Christ.

MRS. MARANDA A. CARR was born in Sullivan District, South Carolina, the 14th of October, 1808, and died February 4, 1881, of consumption. Her maiden name was Rhodes.

She was raised an orphan by a family whose name was Baxter, and with them she moved to Lowndes county, Alabama, where she was married to John Peter Carr, September 9, 1830, by whom she had eight children, seven of whom survive her.

The subject of this memoir was greatly impressed with the importance of religion, and joined the Methodist church when about fifteen years old, and remained a member for several years after her marriage, when her husband joined the Baptist Church, she then went with to that church, and remained a faithful member until her death. It was the privilege of the writer to visit this good sister several times during her last illness, converse with her on the subject of religion and her prospects beyond the grave, she said death had no terror for her beyond its effect on her, physically. She prayed to die easy, and that prayer was answered, for she passed away without a struggle. She called for her husband to her bed, and after talking to him and exhorting him to be faithful, said, "I will you promise me that you will try to meet me up yonder," and then called each member of the family that were present, and exhorted them to be faithful, and to grow up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; sent messages to some that were not present, and then called the weber, and said: "I want you to attend my funeral and gave us a text these words: And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.—Job xix, 5." She said she loved the Methodist Church as well as her own, which she evinced by calling on a Methodist to preach her funeral.

BRO. BENJAMIN THOMPSON, son of Zachariah and Celia D. Thompson, was born in Madison district, S. C., February 2, 1824. With his parents he removed to Georgia in 1826, thence to Mississippi in 1836, and located in Smith county. Soon thereafter he removed to Jasper county, Miss., where he resided until his death, which occurred February 6, 1881.

Bro. Thompson joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1841, was converted in 1851. His life has been written by himself, and is so full of interest to the readers of the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. We commend to Miss Nancy Hockaway, and to all who are contemplating an early marriage, the sad story of his widowhood. Left with a family of children, the eldest but a boy of fifteen years, to fight life's battles alone, he proved himself equal to the task. From that time to his death he held the office of Steward in Mt. Zion Church, Jasper circuit, Mississippi Conference Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He was a leading member of his church; was a kind and affectionate husband and father, a good neighbor, a substantial and upright citizen. Better still, he was a true and faithful Christian, a liberal supporter of the church and cause of his Master. The calls of the church always met a prompt response in Bro. Thompson. The suffering and needy was relieved when applying to him. His place in the church will not easily will scarcely be filled. He leaves a widow and ten living children, five sons and five daughters, all of whom that have arrived at sufficient age are members of the church of their father. The only regret he experienced was that of leaving his family. He was ready to depart and be with Christ. He sleeps in Christ Jesus awaiting the trump of God to awaken him in likeness of his blessed Master. May we meet him on that bright shore.

JAMES BERRY ADAMS, son of Monroe and Francis Adkins, was born in Bartow county, Alabama, June 10, 1849, and died at his father's residence, in Wilcox county, Ala., January 22, 1881.

He married Miss Ella J. Bethany, in Kemper county, Mississippi, in 1876; he was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1866, under the ministry of Rev. John E. Foust, of the Alabama Conference; he was a faithful Christian and useful member of the church. For several years before his death he suffered intensely from dyspepsia; his sufferings were especially severe the last year of his life. His faith was strong, and sustained him in his last sufferings with that strong comfort that Christ only can give. One thing I wish to note in his character. He was not ashamed to profess his faith at home, among his own brothers and sisters, and only a few days before his death, while he was still able to be up. He rallied them to prayer and led them himself. He has left a wife and three small children. His sufferings are over, he rests in Christ. May the blessings of his God comfort the bereaved.

THOMAS E. MORGAN died in San Francisco, California, on Saturday, October 30, 1880. He was the son of Andrew W. and Martha E. Morgan, was born in Choctaw county, Alabama, July 7, 1838.

His father was one of the early settlers of Alabama, having taken up there in 1820. Here young Thomas remained until sixteen years of age, and then with his mother and four brothers, emigrated to California in the fall of 1854. His teens lying in a literary direction, he left school largely to his pursuits, and successfully being at the time of his death extensively employed for several Eastern papers. Gentle and winning in manners, he made many friends and by integrity and morality, won the confidence of all with whom he associated. His death, at the early age of twenty-two, has cast a shadow not only over his immediate family circle, but the community in which he dwelt. But none can feel that such a life is lost. His ways on earth was such that all are assured he left the circle of our sphere for an eternity of rest and enjoyment in the better land. He spoke on his dying bed of the dear ones that had gone before, and that he would soon be at rest with them. He requested his brothers to remain true to the Jesus [illegible] of his mother, which was to walk in the way of the righteous, and his spirit passed to the God who gave it. His funeral was preached by Rev. Winfield Scott, as our minister, Dr. Howard Henderson, was absent from the city.

WM. E. DUNCAN.

MARTHA ELLA BENEDICT, consort of George W. Benedict, and daughter of John O. Denham, of East Baton Rouge parish, La., died in peace at her home, leaving her tender babe to the care of the bereft husband, father and friends who had watched for months the inroads that disease was making upon her constitution, too weak to bear up under the weight, although her friends were led to believe that the crisis was past, and she would recover, but alas! like a deceptive dream, when one awaketh. On the morning of December 22, she was suddenly called from suffering and pain to be with Jesus. So sudden was the summons, for all thought her better and was filled with hope, she gave but few words of comfort to those she left sorrowing for her loss. To a friend who had been very near to her in her afflictions, she said, "Take care of my child," and turning to her husband she said, "The Lord is taking me away, he knows best," and with that simple trust in the blessed Jesus, she breathed her last. Her conversion occurred while we were stationed with the people of East Baton Rouge as their pastor, and many will remember the pastor's visit to the home, on that day when together husband and wife were made to rejoice in the blessed assurance of sins forgiven. While friends, husband, father and pastor joined in songs of praise below, there was rejoicing in the midst of the angels over one, yea, two souls who hath turned from the error of their ways. I knew Sister Ella well, and we thank God that it is not in vain that we in our humble way pointed her to the Lamb of God, the blessed source of relief. We were with her in her afflictions and never heard of complaint did we hear, but calmly trusting in Jesus she suffered quietly and waited patiently the will of the Father. After appropriate services the pastor we laid her to rest by the side of her mother, in the family burying-ground, on Christian soil. Our sufficiency is of God, who encourages us to cast our burdens upon him and we shall be sustained, this was verified in the case of the husband who gave utterance in that sweet assurance that comes from the word of truth, "We shall meet again." May he who sustains those who trust in him sustain the bereft in this dispensation of God.

A BROTHER.

ANGUS EUGENE MENEFEE, third son of W. C. and M. M. Menefee, was born in Greene county, Alabama, February 17, 1864, and died at the same place January 22, 1881.

In infancy he was dedicated to God by his parents and in after years gave himself to God's service. He was just attaining his twenty-first birthday, a young man of much promise. His moral education made him many friends, and will their hence forth be more zealous for the Redeemer's cause, remembering that death, in all-wise Providence, likewise to take them early in the prime of life.

Eugene was elected Sunday school superintendent of the last Quarterly Conference for Pine Bluff circuit, 1880, and this was the stepping stone to preaching of the gospel, wherewith he felt he was called. I knew him in the every day walk of life in the Sabbath school, was his pastor for two years, and I did not wonder that he labored and prayed so much for the success of the Sabbath school at his departure. If love could have checked his heart would not so soon have ceased to beat. Though God's ways are veiled from our sight at present, yet this much we do know, that those whom he loveth, he taketh out of the life of sin. Then end of our darkest hours let us learn to trust. They will be done. God bless the children, and help them to submission to his will, giving the armor of Christ on earth more securely for the battle.

JAMES A. PATTERSON, of Escambia county, Florida, was born in the seventeenth day of December, 1841, and died on the eighth of January, 1881.

Thirty-seven years two months and twenty days were given him to prepare for death and the life beyond the grave. He was a devoted and consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for thirteen years. He possessed largely the grace which is from above, first pure, then peaceable, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. His earnest, spiritual prayers were always heard. His humble, child like way of representing and advocating religion was very impressive. When we say he expected to die and he was at his post. He was ready for the last call. I had no fears in facing the king of terrors. Disease had paralyzed the power of this frame, but full assurance of peace with God. We mourn the loss of our brother. We miss him at class meeting and in the community where he lived, but we are painfully sensible of the bereavement of a fond sister, widow and fatherless children. May the Lord bless them in this heavy affliction.

SISTER LAVENIA POSEY was born in West Feliciana parish, Louisiana, July 2, 1812, and died of pneumonia, at her residence in the same parish, January 18, 1881, aged sixty-six years, six months, and twelve days.

She was married in Brother W. A. Posey in 1832, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1836, under the pastoral care of Rev. T. Jones, and was converted a short time after. At her home which quietly overlooking the progress of God. Since that time till her death she walked with and exemplary life. Being modest and reserved in her disposition, she made very little demonstration of her feelings; but exhibited her faith in her daily life. She lived by faith. Her life was consecrated to God. She had long suffered for some time before her death, but in her affliction she did not murmur, for she knew whom she trusted, and was fully resigned to the will of her Master.

An affectionate wife, a kind mother, and a devoted Christian has gone to rest, till she shall be with all the justified, to meet her Saviour in the skies. May her loved ones follow in her footsteps.

BROTHER EDWARD O. CARTER died in Amite City, Louisiana, in November last, of consumption, who had preceded him in this place some years previously. There was but little more than a year between the time of the death of these two brothers, and the time of the death of their father, who had preceded them to the grave. Their mother was thus left a widow, and bereaved by the change, as his disease (consumption) had taken too firm a hold on his vital parts as to be eradicated. He therefore gradually waited until death put an end to his sufferings, on the 22d of February. I saw him awhile before his death, and at his request prayed with him. He was quite happy and reconciled to God's will, he only regretted leaving his family. We believe that he departed for his change. He leaves a widow and three children to mourn his death.

MRS. MARY W. DUTY died in Trenton, Louisiana, December 7, 1881. She was born December 12, 1823, and married July 21, 1842.

Her last days were full of suffering, but she never heard to murmur; she was only waiting the summons, "Come up higher," to her reward. this great final being made years ago. She was a consistent Christian, and member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. She has gone, doubtless "bearing sheaves" with her. She was loved by a large circle of friends, and we will miss her sadly in our midst. She was kind and gentle with all by whom she was surrounded.

She leaves behind a large family, with whom deeply sympathize; we can only commend them to God, who only Parent, who alone can give healing "Balm of Gilead." Oh! may each one prepared to meet her in that bright and happy home where parting is no more.

AS WE GROW OLD.

As we grow old our yesterdays
Seem very dim and distant;
We grope, as though to darkened ways,
Through all that is existent.
Yet far-off days shine bright and clear
With sins that long have fated,
And faces dead seem strangely near
To those that life has shaded.

As we grow old our tears are few
For friends most lately taken;
But fall—as fell the summer dew
From roses lightly shaken—
When some chance word or idle strain,
The chords of memory sweeping,
Unlock the flood-gates of our pain
For those who taught us weeping.

As we grow old our smiles are rare
To those who greet us daily,
Or, if some living faces wear
The looks that beam so shyly,
From eyes long closed—and we should smile
In answer to their wooing,
'Tis but the past that shines the while
Our power to smile renewing.

As we grow old our dreams at night
Are never of the morrow;
They come with vanished pleasure bright,
Or dark with olden sorrow.
And when we wake the names we say
Are not of any mortals;
But of those in some long dead day
Passed through life's sunset portals.

Entire Sanctification.

BY REV. WILLIAM BURT POPE, D. D.

Reviewing the whole, we may conclude that while the substance of the Methodist doctrine of Entire Sanctification is the same which has been aimed at in all the purest types of practical theology, it has some points of difference, or specific characteristics of great importance.

1. It points to the fulfillment of the Evangelical law with the effusion of Divine love in the heart more strictly and consistently than any other system of teaching. The Mystical and Ascetic teachers of perfection have generally made love, and that the love of God, their Keynote. But they seldom gave a good account of the relation of that love to the obedience which is essential to perfection. Some of them erred by making the absolute moral law the standard; and then the highest result was a striving toward a perfection which faith has not clearly introduced. Others lost all the sight of law in the contemplation of the holiness of Christ, and their perfection was the gradual transformation of the character into his image. Others rightly viewed love as the fulfilling of the law; and supposed that its value in the sight of God was such as to obtain a meritorious acceptance beyond that of more obedience to any law; forgetting, meanwhile, that the preciousness of love, as grace springs from its faith in the merit and strength of the Redeemer. Others separated between the righteousness of the law which is unattainable, and must be reckoned, to the believer, and the perfection of love which he may attain in his own person; thus dividing what the Scripture joins. But the Methodist doctrine boldly declares that the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in believers, that is the righteousness of the new law of faith; and that as faith is reckoned for righteousness, so, faith working by love is reckoned for perfection.

2. The Methodist doctrine is the only one that has consistently and boldly maintained the possibility of the destruction of the carnal mind, or the inbred sin of our fallen nature. It is true that certain of the Mystics held, as we have seen, something almost equivalent to this doctrine; and that the Pietists of the school of Spener included the annihilation of the old Adam among the privileges of God's children. But the utmost contemplated by them was the gradual suppression of the evil nature through the ascendency of love. Now it is undeniable that a very large portion of the Methodist teaching takes that ground, on the same principle that the shedding abroad of love is made the spring of regeneration, its perfect effusion is made the strength of entire sanctification. In many passages of Sermons and Hymns the Wesleys expressly taught this. But they failed not to look deeper into the heart than the region of its affections. They knew that life is more even than love; and that, as the regeneration of the Spirit is the gift of a new life capable of loving God, so the perfection of that love toward God is possible only where the original death of the soul is altogether changed into life. Hence the fervor with which the Hymns appeal to the Holy Ghost for the destruction of inbred sin, and the almost equal earnestness with which the Sermons urge on believers the prayer for faith in the omnipotent power of God, not only to shed abroad his perfect love, but to finish the death of the body of sin. The elimination of the two elements, the negative annihilation of the principle of sin, and the positive effusion of perfect love, is it may be said, peculiar to Methodist theology as such.

3. The original teaching of Methodism was peculiar also in its remarkable blending of the Divine and human elements in the process of entire sanctification. It invariably did justice both to the supreme Divine efficiency and to the co-operation of man. The charge brought against it, sometimes malevolently, sometimes thoughtlessly, that it stimulates believers to expect this supreme and most sacred blessing at any time, irrespective of their preparatory discipline, is contradicted by the whole tenor of the authoritative standards of this doctrine. Wesley's sermon on "The Scripture Way of Salvation" contains an elaborate discussion of this point; and it must be taken as a whole by those who would understand this subject. The sum of all is in the following sentences: "Experience shows that, together with his conviction of sin remaining in our hearts, and cleaving to all our works and actions, as well as the guilt which on account thereof we should incur were we not continually sprinkled with the atoning blood, one thing more is implied in this repentance, namely, a conviction of our helplessness." . . . "But what good works are those the practice of which you affirm to be necessary to sanctification? First, all works of piety; such as public prayer, family prayer, and praying in our closet; receiving the supper of the Lord; searching the Scriptures, by hearing, reading, meditating; and using such a measure of fasting or abstinence as our bodily health allows. Secondly, all works of mercy. . . . This is the repentance, and these the 'fruits meet for repentance,' which are necessary to full sanctification. This is the way wherein God hath appointed his children to wait for complete salvation." "Yet they are not necessary either in the same sense with faith, or in the same degree. This repentance and these fruits are only remotely necessary, necessary in order to the continuance of his faith, as well as the increase of it, whereas faith is immediately and directly necessary to sanctification." "To this confidence, that God is both able and willing to sanctify us now, there needs to be added one thing more—a Divine evidence and conviction that he doeth it. In that hour it is done; God says to the humble soul, 'According to thy faith be it unto thee!' then the soul is pure from every spot of sin; it is clean 'from all unrighteousness.' The believer then experiences the deep meaning of those solemn words: 'If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.'" The intense, absorbing, patient, human preparations of the heart in man are from the same Spirit who at length gives the Divine evidence of the unspeakable power of God to save from all sin. Here it is to be observed that Mr. Wesley passes from the perfect shedding abroad of love in the heart to the application of the supreme efficacy of the atonement to take away the evil of the nature; it is "the moment wherein sin ceases to be." It is more, therefore, than the spirit of entire consecration to which many of those who have received his teaching limit it; it is more even than the abundant effusion of love which may fill the heart's sensibilities without purifying its hidden depths; a distinction which his own words refer to: "How clearly does this express the being perfected in love! How strongly imply the being saved from all sin?"

4. Finally, the doctrine which runs through the works and the whole career of the Wesleys is marked by its reasonableness and moderation as well as its sublimity. The far greater part of the definitions of it are taken up with defining what it is not. It is not absolute perfection, nor the perfection of angels, nor even that of unfallen Adam: it is a perfection which has come up from much tribulation, and bears the scars of infirmity to the end. It is not immunity from temptation, and the possibility of falling, and the remainders of ignorance and shortcoming in the presence of the perfect law the rigor of which is not applied to it in Christ. It is a perfection which is no other than a perfect self-annihilating love in Christ: a perfect union with his passion and his resurrection, and the perfect enjoyment of the value of the name of Jesus, as it is salvation from sin. It is the perfection of being nothing in self, and all in him. It is the perfection for which the elect with one consent have longed, from the Apostles downward; neither more nor less than the muttered groaning desire of the children of God in every age; the common deep inspiration, with only one tone more emphatic than has been always heard, though even that has not been always wanting, for the destruction of the inbred sin of our nature. He who searcheth the heart hath always known the mind of the Spirit, even when its deepest desire has not been clearly uttered. And he will yet, we dare to believe, remove the last letter from the aspirations of his saints, and give them one heart and one voice in seeking the destruction of the body of sin as well as the mortification of its members.

Everybody thinks himself a judge of a sermon, but nine out of ten might as well pretend to weigh the moon. I believe most people think it an uncommon easy thing to preach, and that they could do it themselves. Every donkey thinks itself worthy to stand with the king's horses; every girl thinks she could keep house better than her mother; but thoughts are not facts, for the sprat thought itself a herring, but the fisherman knew better. Try my hand at preaching myself, and I find it no easy thing to give the people something worth hearing; and, if the fine critics, who reckon us all on their thimbles, would but try their own hands at it, they might be a little more quiet. Dogs, however, always will bark, and, what is worse, some of them will bite, too; but let decent people do all they can, if not to muzzle them, yet to prevent their raising any great mischief.

It is a dreadful thing to see a happy family of Christians broken up by a talkative fault-finder, and all about nothing. Small is the edge of the wedge; but when the devil handles the beetle, churches are soon split to pieces, and men wonder why. The fact is, the worst wheel of the cart creaks most, and one fool makes many; and thus many a congregation is sad at seeing such a good and faithful minister who would have been a lasting blessing to them if they had not closed away their best friend. Those who are at the bottom of the mischief have generally no part or lot in the matter at true godliness, but, like sparrows, fight over corn which is not their own; and, like jackdaws, pull to pieces what they never helped to build.—Spurgeon.

FAITH SMALL FISH. A funny Englishman once said: "You can make something of a Scotchman, if you catch him young." There are multitudes of souls around us whom we must catch for the Lord when they are young, or we shall lose them forever. The fact is, that there are now, in our country, great blocks, or masses of society, that never "go to church" at all. When their children grow up, of course they will not go to church either. As far as we can see, the best hope, and almost the only hope, is in catching them off the streets when they are young. Then we may by grace divine make something of them. Remember the fable. A man caught a little fish. "Let me go," said the little fish, "and when I have grown bigger you can catch me again." "Oh no," said the man, "I might not catch you again." Catch the little fish in the gospel net. When they grow bigger, they will be far away from you. They that are fishers of men should go for the little fish. If they are small, they are sweet. Jesus could make "a few small fishes" serve for a great host. If we catch a soul young you get a whole life given to Christ, instead of a few years.

There is a selfishness even in gratitude, when it is too profuse; to be overthankful for one favor is in effect to lay out for another.—Cumberland.

The young man hastens toward a reputation. He gives ample proof of ability and success, but only later in life does he find out that the world will admit him into its favor only after years of steady wrestling with obstacles and slow stages of personal growth. One of the fundamental evils of our times is that the young are too hasty in endeavoring to reach a culmination of character. Each one should move on fearlessly in the pursuit of his object, and turn neither to the right nor to the left. The things to be discarded and disregarded are more numerous than those he is to aim at. Every weight must be laid aside. He should have one goal, and all other things should be forgotten.—Christian Advocate.

MISSIONARY.

—Stanley continues his travels toward the interior without allowing himself to be stopped by the difficulties of his enterprise. The seventh of November he was rejoiced to meet M. Savorgnan de Brazza, who, after having suspended the Ogoone to its source, and having established the first station of the French Committee between the affluents of Ogoone and those of Alima and Leeoni, tributaries of the Congo, descended the course of the first of these rivers, traversed the territory of Apfourous, and reached by land the shores of the Congo, following some distance the banks of the Alima. Resuming navigation, he descended the course of the Congo half way to the Stanley Pool, where he founded a new station. Then, continuing to follow the course of the river, he rejoined Stanley. Dr. Ballay and M. Mison are en route for Ogoour. The first will resume, with M. Savorgnan de Brazza, the mission of exploration which the Ministry of Public Instruction charged them. It appears that the journey made by Savorgnan de Brazza toward the interior of Africa is a much more practicable route than the lower course of the Congo.

—At the meeting of the General Committee of the Church Missionary Society of Great Britain last December letters were read from Robert Arthington, Esq., of Leeds, offering the sum of £5,000 to be invested in the names of trustees and the interest used toward the maintenance of a steamer and staff of agents on the Upper Benue and Lake Tchad, for the purpose of facilitating the evangelization of nations and tribes in those regions of Africa. The Committee expressed their thankfulness to Mr. Arthington for his valuable proposal, but directed the Secretaries to explain to him that the interest accruing from the amount offered would be wholly inadequate to the expense of the mission proposed; and that they ventured to hope that he might see his way to give the money toward carrying on the work of the Society on the Upper Benue.

—The following is an example of the power of the gospel in a heathen land: A Kaffir girl in South Africa, went to a missionary and dropped forty-six pennies into his hand, saying, "That is your money." "You don't owe me anything," replied the teacher. "I do," she answered; "and I will tell you how. At the public examination you promise a sixpence to any one in the class I was in who could write the best specimen on a slate. I gave in my slate and got the sixpence; but you did not know then that another person wrote a far better specimen beside. Yesterday you were reading in the church about Zaccheus who said, 'If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold.' I took home to me six pence, and I bring you back four."

—Mr. J. M. Thorwart, a Hollander, proposes to traverse Africa from the Mediterranean to the Cape of Good Hope. He possesses considerable fortune and has had much experience as a traveler. After spending the autumn in preparation at Alexandria and Cairo, he set forth on his expedition, taking with him only a servant and a little baggage. It is announced that he will be joined by a Frenchman who has lived a long while in Abyssinia. Before setting out he secured from the Egyptian government promises of such facilities as it could afford, for his journey as far as the limits of the Egyptian territory. If he succeeds in his endeavor his name will be placed by the side of the most renowned African explorers.

—The Rev. George Hoal illustrates the commercial value of missions by referring to the trade of the United States with Micronesian and adjacent islands. It seems that the first missionaries went to these islands in 1852, and that in 1879 business was carried on which has yielded profit amounting to nearly $7,000,000. The Board during that year appropriated for that mission $16,750. Or in other words, missions paid and $1, and commerce, in trade created by the missions, received back $49 75. And this before most people knew such a mission was in existence.

Two memorial tablets have been lately erected in old St. George's, Philadelphia. The venerable church was founded in 1769. One of the tablets has the following inscription: "The First Methodist Conference in America, consisting of ten members, was held in this church, July 14, 1773." Upon the other are the words: "In memory of Rev. John Dickens, founder of the Methodist Book Concern of the United States, who died 1798, while pastor of this church, and whose remains are interred in the rear of this building."

—The Bush Missionary Society, of Sydney, Australia, employs five missionaries, who are each provided with a wagonette and a pair of horses for traveling and the conveyance of Bibles, religious books, and tracts for sale and distribution. It held last year 112 services; sold, 518 Bibles and Testaments, 2,220 other books, and distributed thirty thousand tracts.

—Under the direction of William Taylor a party of three started for the mission field of Chili, Feb. 4: Professor Lemon, bound for Santiago; and Misses Potter and Spink, for Concepcion; Rev. H. M. Jeffrey, of the Des Moines Conference, started on the tenth instant to join his brother in the educational and evangelical work at Concepcion.

—An exchange says: "The Scotch Presbyterian churches are not very partial to church fairs, or 'bazars,' as they call them. When, however, they do have one, they make it amount to something. A bazar was lately held in Edinburg in aid of the fund for increasing the salaries of the Waldensian pastors, and the result was the handsome sum of $11,100 for this fund."

—Mtesa, the savage King of Uganda, has sacrificed two hundred human beings on the graves of his ancestors, and given a cold shoulder to the missionaries, who are of no use, he thinks, unless they will furnish him with arms and ammunition.

—The Emperor of Brazil, in order to encourage the ending of Protestant Missionaries into his dominions, has offered, it is said, to pay the expenses of their transportation.

—The Rev. J. E. Clough, of the mission among the Telougoos at Ongole, India, says that since the organization of the church in 1877, 12,396 have united with it.

—In connection with the American Baptist mission among the Telougoos of India, there have been ordained twenty-four of the converts for mission work. There have been more than one thousand three hundred converts baptized since January, 1880.

—The eighteenth anniversary of the Methodist Chapel in the Rue Roquepine, Paris, was celebrated on the first day of November.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—A correspondent from Cape Elizabeth, Me., writes: "In the valley of Reem's Creek, Buncombe, North Carolina, is a community of farmers—honest, upright and God-fearing people, but poor. They manage to sustain a Sunday-school, but are very destitute of books, tracts, etc., except Bible and Testament. In our Sunday-schools and in nearly every household are books which have been read and laid aside, which, if these people had them, would exercise and educating influence, excite an interest in the school, build it up, and where now only 25 attend there would be nearly a hundred. Address Superintendent of Sunday-school, near James' Hemphill's, Vanceville, Buncombe county, N. C."

—The Archbishop of Paris has addressed a long and earnest letter of remonstrance to the Chamber of Deputies against the proposed suppression of the dispensation from military services hitherto accorded to candidates for the priesthood. The law does not propose to suppress this dispensation absolutely, but it proposes to confine it to those only who intend to become, and who shall actually become, parish priests. The Archbishop insists upon it being maintained in favor of all who embraced the ecclesiastical life.

—W. P. Paxson, Superintendent at the Southwest for the American Sunday-school Union, in a recent address at Boston, stated that Mr. Oliver Bennett, now living in Massachusetts, formerly of St. Louis, had given $1,000 a year for twenty years for the support of Sunday-school missionaries in the West, and that this money had organized 3,290 schools, with more than 140,000.

Mr. Spurgeon is confined to his room, and much of the time to his bed, by rheumatism, to which has been added great nervous depression. The physicians recommend a trip to Australia. The Tabernacle Church, of which Mr. Spurgeon is pastor, received upwards of 150 persons into fellowship last year, dismissed nearly 200 to other churches, and lost sixty-five members by death, making the net gain of membership about one hundred.

Two churches in Worcester, Mass., were relieved from indebtedness Feb. 27. The debts of Plymouth Congregational Church amounted to $8,515. Mr. Kimball was present at two services, and $11,000 was subscribed. The debts of the Union Church, amounting to $23,000, with also paid, and $2,500 was raised for the object to floating obligations.

Rev. Narayan Shesharri, in his report as to the country, delivered 120 addresses, including sermons, and spoke before eleven colleges and theological seminaries. Just before his return, a member of one of the New York churches handed him a check for $1,000, the name of the giver not to be made known.

The Catholics are defending the advisability of founding a new Catholic University at Washington, New York. Their objections expressed through the weekly journals of secular newspapers are mingled and elongated, and foster an unphilanthropic rest for scandals.

The Church of the Advent, in Boston, is extremely Ritualistic. Its four ministers wear cassocks at all times, practice celibacy, and live in a house by themselves. The parish is very prosperous, has 800 communicants, and have erected a new church without going into debt.

There are in Peking fifty temples and over, the chief being that of Jagganath. This temple has 600 officers, 100 families of cooks, 120 dancing girls, 3,000 priests, all of whom are supported by fees and contributions of the pilgrims, and the side of holy food, sold to them at eight times its cost.

The whole sum aimed at by the Presbyterian churches for the increase of the salaries of the Waldensian pastors is $20,000. The sum already reached is $15,000. Of this $5,000 have been given by Mr. R. L. Stuart, of New York, the largest subscription to the fund.

There have recently been discovered two monological tables at Tung Chow, China, which Mr. Crawford, missionary of the Baptist Board, identifies with the genealogies of Adam, Genesis v., and the generations of the sons of Noah Genesis x.

The tablet in memory of Dr. William Adams, which has been recently placed in the chapel of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, bears the inscription: "An eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures."

The Preachers' Aid Society of the Baltimore Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, has accumulated assets to the amount of $8,315 6. Among the receipts in last year was the sum $5,000 a legacy from the late Thomas Sykes.

The deaths are announced of two missionaries of the Irish Methodist Church, who were well known by their diligent and successful labors, Rev. Robert Huston, of Dublin, who was in his 73d year, and Rev. John Walker, of Liverpool.

The Canterbury Convocation has been prorogued till May 17. The upper house passed a resolution deprecating legislation, and declaring that the authority to settle matters of ritual is inherent in the Episcopal office.

It is reported that the statistics of the Reformed Episcopal Church show a greater addition to its membership during the past year than in any preceding one, not excepting the first year of its organization.

A Bankes memorial hall is to be built in Gloucester, England, the birthplace of Robert Raikes. Fifty towns are already represented in the list of subscribers.

The Irish Presbyterian Church has narrowly escaped a great scandal in the shape of a lawsuit, brought by one of its missionaries in India against another for libel. This case was arranged at the last moment before opening the trial.

Unlike the free church and voluntary system, the annual receipts of the First Baptist Church, Brooklyn, have advanced from $3,000 under the old pew-renting system, to $10,500 under the new.

The Methodist Episcopal Church for the first half of 1880 gained about 27,000 communicants and 162 itinerant ministers. The deaths among lay members for the year ending July, 1880, numbered 21,[illegible].

In the nine months since the meeting of the Presbyterian Assembly seventy-one Presbyterian ministers have died, against seventy-six for the previous twelve months.

Our brethren of the African M. E. Church have dedicated two churches in Liberia, one in Monrovia, and the other at Arlington, on St. Paul's River, thirty miles from Monrovia.

The Lutheran congregation at Platteville, Wis., is one of the largest congregations in the United States. It numbers nine hundred communicants.

Our Young People.

NEVER OUT OF SIGHT.

I know a little saying
That is altogether true,
My little boy, my little girl,
The saying is for you.
'Tis God's own admonition,
And gray—so deep and bright
No child in all this careless world
Is ever out of sight.

No matter whether field or glen,
Or city's crowded way,
Or playmate's laugh or baby's bum,
Entice your feet to stay;
Some one is always watching you,
And whether wrong or right,
No child in all this busy world
Is ever out of sight.

Some one is also watching you,
And marking what you do,
To see if all your childhood's acts
Are honest, brave and true;
And watchful more than mortal kind
God's angels pure and white,
In gladness or in sorrowing
Are keeping you in sight.

O bear in mind, my little one,
And let your mark be high:
You do whatever thing you do,
Beneath some seeing eye;
O bear in mind, my little one,
And keep your good name bright,
No child upon this round, round earth
Is ever out of sight.

A Little Girl's Gift.

MR. EDITOR: As I have never seen any letters from Pushmataha, in the young people's department, I thought I would write you one. My father takes the ADVOCATE; I like it very much, especially your "Young People." We have a Sabbath-school. Dr. Gilder is superintendent. He is very prompt, and we have a good Sabbath-school. I am a little girl nine years old. Miss Mary Gilder is my Sabbath school teacher. She is such a good woman, I love for her to hear my lessons. We need a good stove in our church to keep us warm on cold Sundays and preaching days. Papa is pastor of the church on this circuit. Mr. Dubose has charge of the day school here. He is a fine teacher, and has a good school. I see Dr. Lambuth wants all of the Sabbath-schools to send him ten dollars to build a church in China. I have earned a dollar by helping mamma about the house which I send you, and want you to give it to him for that purpose. Papa carried ten dollars with him, from our Sabbath-school for this purpose when he went to Conference at Pensacola, Fla. I hope all our Sunday schools will respond to Dr. Lambuth's call.

Your little friend,

MARY E. DAWKINS.

Pushmataha, Ala., March 21st.

Note from the Editor.—The one dollar will be forwarded at once to Bro. Lambuth. It will help to build that church in China.

The Starling-pond.

The kitchen was in completest after-dinner order. Mary's two hands had dried all the dishes and set them away and swept the room; now she sat parsing the apples that were to be baked in sugar for early tea, sat with half-sad, half-dreamy look on her usually sunny face, and, pared the apples so slowly that tea-time might almost have come before it was done. She was tired, and she was also just a little blue. It had been a very busy day.

Before the first streak of daylight had appeared, she was up and at work, and her busy feet had not found a moment's resting-place since, though it was now after three o'clock. Uncle Horace, and Aunt Augusta, and Cousin Ethel had been there to dinner, and were gone now for a sleigh-ride. There wasn't room for her in the sleigh, and besides the apples had to be pared. There were very apt to be apples or something to attend to, in Mary's life. She didn't care much, however. She was four months and three days older than Cousin Ethel, but nobody would have guessed it. What with her stylish hats, and real kid boots, and handsome furs and kid gloves, Ethel looked quite the grown up lady, and Mary was only a good-hearted, rapable little girl.

A good scholar in school, a trim little housekeeper at home and a wonderfully "handy" child anywhere. That was what people who knew her were sure to say. But she was by no means a young lady. Besides and this "be sides" covered the sigh which came every once in awhile from Mary's heart. Ethel was going abroad going to Europe to spend two years. This was her last visit before they sailed, and in less than another month they would be on the ocean. Mary had all her life and it seemed to her just now a very long life wanted to see the ocean. There was no present likelihood that she ever would see it. She wanted to go to Europe herself. She was sure she could appreciate the sights and sounds of the rare old world fully as well as Cousin Ethel could. Why should all the nice things come to her, and her cousin have to sit in that large neat kitchen and pare apples? She wasn't exactly cross, neither was she jealous; she wouldn't have kept Ethel from going for all the world, I cannot say she was even miserable; she was just a trifle melancholy.

She went on with her peeling, and with her thoughts. By and by, if you had been watching her, you would have known by the quickened movement of her hands that her thoughts were brightening. The apples began to drop rapidly into the tin. She had a new idea: "I'll go to Europe myself, see it I don't this very spring. I'll borrow just the right books at the library and read up on them, and keep a diary about the places I go to, and the people I see. No, I'll write to Lollie Adams all about it. Ethel said she had promised to write to her dear friend Helen every week; it is queer she never said anything about writing to me, and I her own cousin? Never mind I won't write to her either; but Lollie Adams shall hear from me every day. I'll hand her the letters as I go to school; she can read them over while she sits and sews, and she will like it, I know. She will call it one of her 'helps.' That is a real nice idea, Mary Burton: I don't see why you can't go to Europe as well as anybody. When Ethel comes back, won't it be fun to compare notes! Just as soon as these apples are done, I mean to hunt out a book and set to work."

By this time, the cores were being dug out of the apples very fast, and the tin was almost full; besides, the melancholy look had vanished from Mary's face. When a person is going to start in five minutes for Europe, and leaves no one behind she cares much for, and is quite sure of not being sea sick, why should she be melancholy? The Fancy.

A Knowing Cat.

A great many stories are told about intelligent dogs, while the poor little kitties that so many of our little folks love and pet are not considered worth talking about. But I'm sure you will say that this cat I shall tell you about was a wonderfully bright one. His name was Toni, and for several years he lived on the Scilly, one of a line of English ships, and had crossed the ocean so frequently that he had become almost as necessary to the regular voyagers as the captain himself. He had become a great pet with the officers as well as the crew, and many a merchant who had often crossed the sea in that ship would greet him as he walked through the cabin or on deck, in a very much-at-home manner, with:

"Well, Toni, how are you, sir, and how did you enjoy the last voyage, and what do you think of the company aboard and do you remember me, old fellow?" while Tom would look up with and intelligent air, as though he understood all the questions, and wished he could talk and answer them all.

When the ship arrived at her dock in New York or London, Tom was one of the first passengers ashore, and, while the cargo was being unloaded, and the ship refreighted for her return voyage, Tom would call at his old haunts and see his old friends, but was always on hand and on board when the ship was ready to leave her mooring. Many wondered how it was possible for Tom to distinguish from the great number of ships at the docks the identical one in which he had found a home, and the sailors took delight in showing his sagacity to those who insisted that the cat was probably taken on board by one of the crew, and, who expressed their doubt of the possibility of his knowing his own ship. A short time since as the Scilly was getting under way from New York, one of the deck-hands discovered Tom on the wharf mewing piteously and looking wishfully toward the outgoing ship.

Promptly heretofore, poor Tom was a little too late, and, as the captain stood for a few moments at the stern of the vessel looking at him, he said to a gentleman standing near, "Poor Tom, I expect we have seen the last of him. He has made, I believe, twenty voyages with us, and no officer has made his appearance before the departure of the steamer with more promptness than Tom, life looks disappointed enough, doesn't he?"

So the ship went on, leaving Tom standing in dumb surprise on the shore.

But, like people, he began very soon to think what was the next thing to be done, and before long he had decided to take another steamer for Europe, and, strange to say, among the number of their decks destined for different and wildly separated ports, he chose the Italy, of the same line in which he was accustomed to take his voyages, which sailed for the old familiar port. At the appointed time he set sail with the passengers, and, after a pleasant voyage arrived one morning in London. As soon as Tom was ashore he ran up and down the docks, looking at the various ships, which were at anchor there, and was not long in discovering his old home, the Scilly, which in a few hours would have been on her return voyage.

The captain and some of the crew who saw Tom as he walked on board with a joyful air could scarcely believe their eyes, and no military general or grandee of any kind, who a short time afterwards were counted among the passengers for America, was received on board with as much delight and attention as old Tom, the knowing cat.

If anybody tells you that cats do not know much, you tell them this true story about Tom, the Atlantic voyager.

THE CARE OF THE EYES. The eye is one of the most delicate organs of the body, and partial or total blindness one of the things to be deplored, and to be carefully guarded against.

Even strong eyes soon become weakened, and often diseased, by being carelessly treated.

When reading, writing, or working, the light should always fall over the left shoulder, and the book or work should never be held nearer to the eyes than is necessary.

It is always important to sit up straight. Stooping is not only injurious to the eyes, but to the lungs and spine.

Never work in the twilight, or by a dim light.

Reading or writing in a car or carriage is hurtful to the eyes.

If you work by gas-light, the jet should be shaded, and the light clear and steady.

Do not read in bed, nor lying down, nor in a swinging hammock. Sleep in a well ventilated room, and be in such a position that a bright light will not strike your eyes when you waken. Bathe your eyes freely each night and morning with cold water, to which occasionally it is well to add a little salt.

If your eyes are weary or painful from too close application, rest them by closing them, or looking away from your work, or bathe them with cold water, or with extract of witch hazel.

Any foreign substance in the eye can usually be removed by taking the upper eye-lid between the thumb and finger, and drawing it down over the lower lid, gently pressing it toward the nose.

Little children should be particularly careful not to distort the eyes by constant winking or twitching of the eye-lids, or by turning the eyes toward the nose. Many children have become permanently cross-eyed, and others seriously injure their eye-sight by these pernicious practices.

Children who are near-sighted should immediately be provided with glasses by a competent optician, and by this means a cure is often effected.

The following of these simple rules may put far off the evil day of failing eye-sight and glasses, and possibly avert it altogether.

GOOD-MORNING. Don't forget to say "Good-morning!" Say it to your parents, your brothers and sisters, your schoolmates, your teachers and say it cheerfully, and with a smile; it will do you good, and do your friends good. There's a kind inspiration in every "Good-morning" heartily spoken, that helps to make home fresher and work lighter. It seems really the morning good, and to be a prophecy of a good day to come after it. And if this be true of the "good-morning," it is also of kind, heartsome greetings; they cheer the discouraged, rest the tired ones, somehow the wheels of life run more smoothly. Be liberal with them, then, and let no morning pass, however dark and gloomy it may be, that you do not help at least to brighten by your smiles and cheerful words.—Anon.

Remarkable Suicides.

We do not know that suicide is increasing, but our attention has been called of late to some rather remarkable cases of self-destruction. That of Gen. Upton, in California, is one. Two others were citizens of New Orleans, and these were both men in middle age, enjoying good health, in good circumstances, having young and interesting families, and always manifesting the deepest affection for wives and children. In none of these persons were there any indications of mental derangement. They were the last persons in the world whom their most intimate friends and acquaintances would have suspected of the intent. In the two instances in this city the gentlemen spend their last hours in social converse with their families, apparently cheerful and happy, and passing directly from the company of clinging, dependent and loving children and devoted wives, they put an end to their earthly being.

We are at a loss to explain such suicides. In circumstances of great trouble and suffering, where the restraints and consolations of religion are not felt, it is not very strange that people should seek relief in self-destruction. The marvel is that suicide is not more common among those who are at once utterly miserable and utterly skeptical. It is, we think, needless to assume that mental derangement is the cause in every case, or even in most cases. This is frequently the cause, but by no means always. And, on the other hand, we are scarcely warranted in assuming that the suicide always acts under the conviction that there is no future life. We rather suspect that it takes place often when the mind is nearly equally poised between hope and doubt, and when the suspense becomes intolerable. The great and fearful mystery is dwelt upon until the subject is invested with a terrible and irresistable facination, and the desire to know becomes at length a paroxysm, that overcomes the instinctive love of life, and for the moment overshadows all natural affection and all moral considerations.

That our secular papers should speak of a given case of suicide as an endeavor to solve the great mystery, and that writers of a certain class should speak of death as the clearing up of a painful and perplexing problem, are significant. The materialistic aspect of modern doubt makes the question of a future life, and of conscious immortality, the absorbing subject of speculation. What this life may be, and the conditions and interests which it involves, are subordinate to the query, whether there is a future life. What we shall be is of small moment, until the belief that we shall be is firmly established. This is, in an atmosphere of materialistic and correspondingly atheistical doubt, the tremendous and the comprehensive question. "To be or not to be" is the question that agitates thousands of minds in which the skeptical bent is strong. When the pulling of a loair trigger may reveal all, or end all, is it inconceivable that under the spell of a horrid facination some should seek to raise the curtain, and to know? It is true that none have long to wait before, in the order of nature, there shall be emergence into life or nothingness. But, rather than endure the brief suspense, and submit longer to be tossed and maddened, and puzzled by uncertainty, some are drawn to the vortex, and are overmastered and swallowed up.

In the instances of suicide to which we have referred there seems to have been the absence of all ordinary causes, such as mental aberration, bodily pain, domestic trouble or business embarrassments. With everything earthly to live for, and with the ordinary conditions of temporal happiness nearly perfect, they deliberately choose self-destruction. Under the leadings of conscience, under bondage to some loathsome vice, under the torments of remorse, people kill themselves sometimes. But in these cases there were no traces of such influences. It is not conceivable that any one possessed of a true evangelical faith and experience, and of sound mind, could be guilty of self-destruction. In such a one there is not only moral restraint, but the future life and human accountability are abiding and settled convictions. The sense of God, and the persuasion of the world to come, are as clear and strong and real as are the objects and realities of the present world. It is only where a dark and disturbing skepticism has taken possession of the soul, and where doubt has left the heart without a sure refuge, that a man is rendered capable of the attempt to hurl the veil before the appointed time.

Whether these instances are to be thus accounted for or not, we think that there is a cause for some suicides, to be found in the religion of doubt, and in the very perplexity and suspense of a non-faith, which boastfully accepts and claims the title of agnosticism. We can know nothing of God, and of a future life here, but a pistol shot may reveal all. Whether life be worth living or not depends upon what death may be, and upon what death may reveal. With such principles and convictions there is as much logic and reason as insanity in suicide.

In the light of Divine revelation suicide is a crime—always a moral madness. The remedy is in the faith and experience of the gospel. The instinctive love of life needs to be reenforced, and to be constantly strengthened by the authority and consolations of religion. Without these, this most sad and gloomy manifestation of sin will increase as the world increases in knowledge, science and art.

It seems rather difficult to find out exactly how Mr. Garfield stands on the total abstinence question. Shortly after the inauguration Miss Frances E. Willard, on presenting the portrait of Mrs. Hayes, addressed the President in very eloquent terms. The portrait had been painted, and was now presented, to be hung in the White House, to commemorate Mrs. Hayes' course on the temperance question. President Garfield, in his reply to Miss Willard, said:

"I have observed the significance which you have given to this portrait from the standpoint you occupy, and in connection with the work in which you are engaged. What you have said concerning the evils of intemperance meets my most hearty concurrence. I have been in my way, and, in accordance with my own convictions, an earnest advocate of temperance, not in so narrow a sense as some, but in a very definite and practical sense. These convictions are deep, and will be maintained. Whether I shall be able to meet the views of all people in regard to all phases of that question remains to be seen, but I shall do what I can to abate the great evils of intemperance. I shall be glad to have this picture upon these walls, and shall be glad to remember your kind expressions to me and my family, and, in your efforts to better mankind by your work, I hope that you will be guided by wisdom, and that you will achieve a worthy success. Thanking you for this meeting and greeting, I bid you good morning."

Ever since Mr. Garfield's election was known, the temperance people, especially the advanced temperance ladies, have been trying to find out whether Mr. Garfield intended to follow the Hayes' administration in the exclusion of wine from the President's table and State dinners. During these months Mr. Garfield has been pursued by advice; he has been interviewed, badgered, almost persecuted, on the subject of temperance, and yet he came to the White House without having made any declaration.

Surely on the presentation of the portrait of Mrs. Hayes, and with such an adroit address as Miss Willard could make, the long and well-kept secret will be revealed. But, alas! the ladies left no wiser than they came, or, if wiser, with perhaps some shade of misgiving. Not in that speech, nor in any other, has Mr. Garfield committed himself on this point. It looks as if he intended to make no pledges, and, also, as if he might tolerate wine, if nothing stronger, at the White House entertainments. We hope our new President will be temperate, that he will allow neither wine nor strong drink on his private or public table. But we are in doubt. The ways and the speeches of politicians are both provoking and mysterious. If Mr. Garfield's temperance friends should, after all this annoying suspense, be disappointed, what will they do about it? We predict that they will quietly accept the situation, throw the mantle of charity over Bro. Garfield's shortcomings, and continue to support the party and the Republican President.

The Negro.

My family is enjoying a visit from my old mammy, who is also the mammy of all my children. Whenever she comes to see us, beginning with the oldest and going on down to the baby, she greets us with a hug and a kiss. In a little while she takes, undisturbed, possession of all the keys, just like she used to do when I belonged to her; and, seated upon her ancient kitchen throne, she magnifies her office, and dispenses her blessing with the same queenly airs that marked her administration forty-five years ago. Such characters and such relationships are the peculiar products of the extinct "peculiar institution." When the old mammies now alive shall all die they will leave no successors, and in their death will be broken one of the strongest bonds that has bound the white and black together for years past. The special reason for her coming at this particular time is to get relief from mental distress. There is prevailing among the negroes what Bible critics would call an extensive "eschatological excitement." They have heard that "Mother Shipton," or some other old goose, has predicted that the end of the world will come this year. Enough to start on. Then they have seen this winter two big snows, from which many wild birds and tame fowls died, and two freshets in the river instead of one, which is the common number; very strong corroborative facts. But proof, positive, convincing, they found in the positions of the moon and stars of late. Such data, visions, birds, stars and storms will put the auguring mind of the darkie to work, and you may be sure his logic of fact will drive him to some awful conclusion.

What is to become of this race, when they will be delivered from the paralysis of fear, and the tyranny of whim and fancy and ignorance; what is to be their final destiny no man can tell, for no man knows how God, in his providence, will solve this problem. But, no matter what may be their fate in the near or the distant future, there are certain facts now behind us, and others now around us, which indicate plainly our present duty to them as Southern men and Christians. As slaves they were brought from the savage jungles of their native land, cruel, cannibal, and devoted to the most degrading fetichisms. As slaves they were sold to the Americans, and were recognized as such by the constitutions of the States and of the United States. Under these constitutions a class of laws, known as the slave code, was enacted, and under this code they lived until enfranchised by acts of conventions of the States. Narrow, morbid sentimentalists, mistaking their maudlin sympathies for solid philanthropy, have delighted to denounce this code as wholly cruel, bloody and debasing to the negro, and to tell the world that on account of it the South is now all overhung with clouds, surcharged with fire and brimstone, just ready to be poured out for the utter burning up of what they are pleased to call "this vast modern Sodom;" and a few Southern born men, apparently drunk with ambition, or the greed of office and gain, in preaching a new South from pulpit or platform, are oblivious to all the achievements of our morals and our statesmanship, and can see only corruption and blunder in the history past and current of our people. Grant that the old slave code was not all that it should have been, still its practical wisdom and beneficence are vindicated by the undeniable and immeasurable elevation in every element of manhood attained by the negro while living under it. The wild men were tamed, and, in a measure, all of them were civilized, while thousands were brought into vital connection with the Saviour of the world by the faithful ministry of the word of God. To deny these facts is insanity; to ignore them is baseness.

Did not the South fear they would return to their original African worships when set free, and did not its happy disappointment at this point prove that their "previous condition" had torn from their hearts the very roots of their foul fetichism? And did not the North believe they were able to govern States, make laws and sit as judges—a very great over-estimate, it is true, but a fact, nevertheless, and a fact, too, that most powerfully testifies to the wisdom of the laws under which they were reared? The harm of slavery was to the whites, the good to the blacks. But they are now emancipated, and we are all glad of it. I have never been ashamed of my personal connection with the "peculiar institution," nor of the record of my church on the subject, nor do I ever expect to blush as a Southern man, when thinking of the immense and multiform benefits they derived from their bondage. And if the divine curse or blessing is to rest upon us for our connection with the negro, then no man need flee in fear of a coming deluge of brimstone and fire, but every man can go to work peacefully at home, and confidently look for Heaven's blessings in forms of every good and perfect gift.

But they are still among us, and likely to stay; still the "inferior race," and likely to continue so. They still have claims upon us. There is still work to do—a vast amount of it—both for their sake and ours. Indeed, the work was only begun when they were set free, which we are to complete, or help them to complete.

Everybody that knows these people knows that as a race (individual exceptions, thanks to the gospel under the old slave code,) they have for centuries utterly ignored the seventh and eighth commandments, and that consequently upon their moral nature are two great putrid cancers, which seem to have cast their venom and planted their fangs in the very center of their being. The classic name of one is polygamy, and of the other kleptomania. These two monstrous things must be destroyed. In thinking of the magnitude of the task, one would loose all hope did not charity suggest three facts: First, all writers on moral science make apology for Spartan theft. Second, the letter the apostles and brethren sent out from the Jerusalem Church to be read to the first converts, real converts, remember, of St. Paul, had in it these words: "That ye abstain from meat offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled and from fornication." Third, we do know that these very vices were largely suppressed, in some cases entirely corrected under the tutelage of their bondage. Past success, partial though it is, should constitute the basis of hope and the pledge of fulfillment.

Our first duty to the negro is to make these crimes odious in his eyes. To do this no allowable means or methods should be neglected. Grand juries should make diligent inquisition, and courts should hold the black man up to the law, just as they do the white man; both should be made to mind the same things, and walk by the same rule, or suffer the same penalties. Let the courts and juries obliterate this "color line." We ought also, in employing servants and laborers, to give preference to purity and honesty, never employing a person of any other character if it be possible to avoid it. And a very important matter is to insist that families have rooms for the daughters, and for the sons, separate from those of the parents. This will be perhaps the most difficult revolution to accomplish, yet without it there can be no chastity, and consequently no virtue of any sort. We should also preach to them when we can, and stand by their own preachers, so long as they live right and preach salvation from sin, and denounce them when they do otherwise. But the throne of greatest power is in the school-house. If on that throne sits a person of broad and clear views, who, with letters, will teach morals, and cultivate a sense of God's presence, and a knowledge of his law, the amount of good to be done is incalculable. The States are doing what they can, and many persons of real benevolence are aiding. God bless them, these poor people from the North, and in the South, but in many cases the teachers are incompetent and immoral. Why could not Southern persons open boarding-schools, such as are now in Talladega, Marion and other places, under the control of Northern men and women, who are doing good and making money. Letters and Christian morals must go together, for these are the co-ordinates which, in the system of human life and worthiness, determine, with almost mathematical precision, the point a man or a nation occupies with reference to the Divine center.

Catholic—Christian—Which the Older Word?

Some time ago this writer had the privilege of hearing a lecture from a Roman Catholic priest, on the subject: "Which is the true church." Hoping to hear something new, or learned or edifying, he was not a little disappointed, but was thoroughly satisfied as to the sort of theological pabulum on which Romish congregations are compelled to feed. The reverend lecturer affected vast learning, and spent much time in the critical or hyper critical discussion of the etymology of words. Among other pretended proofs in favor of the ancient, divine origin of the Roman and only true church, he said believers were called Catholic before Christian. The term Christian, he said very properly, was first employed at the city of Antioch, but before that believers were called Catholics by our Lord and his apostles. "Now," said he, "what proof have I of this? Why, the Apostle's Creed. It says: 'I believe in the holy Catholic Church.'" This statement was received as a truth never questioned, and a perfect settlement of the entire controversy. Some few Romish writers have contended that the creed was composed by the apostles, but now almost all historians agree that, "In its present form at least, it is not of later date than the fourth century." But, admitting an origin nearer the age of the apostles, his statement is untrue. The word Catholic was not in the earlier editions of the creed. Bishop Pearson, the highest authority, says: "And the Greeks having added, by way of explication or determination, the word Catholick; it was at last received into the Latin creed." And again: "Now the word Catholick, as it is not read in the Scriptures, so was it not anciently in the creed." Another author tells us that the use of it in public worship was not introduced in the Roman Church until the eleventh century. Still the ignorant masses of Romanism accept such bold assertions as historic and almost divine truth. Not allowed to attend other services, they are cut off from all sources of enlightenment. They are, therefore, doomed to perpetual darkness and error, though the light shines around them.

Our Alabama Schools.

MR. EDITOR: In reading your paper of the seventeenth instant my attention was specially attracted by three articles: one relating to the action of the last session of the Alabama Conference, looking to the endowment of a professorship in the Southern University; one stating that Mr. George I. Seney, of New York, has recently given $30,000 to the Methodist College in Georgia—$10,000 to endow a professorship and $20,000 to erect a needed building; and one by J. W. R., referring to the strain by which our church schools in Alabama have been kept up.

J. W. R. has stated a fact. It has been a constant strain to keep our church schools alive. Why is this? Is it not owing, in part, to this, that we have wasted our strength by trying to keep up too many schools? Would it not be better to concentrate all our labors upon two schools, one for boys and one for girls? Would not two successful schools awaken more enthusiasm among our people than do the present number, all of which are under a constant struggle for existence? So it seems to me, and has for years past. It is proper for me to say that I have no local interest in any of our schools, for neither of them is located in the place of my residence.

The Conference is right in saying the Southern University ought to be endowed. For, even under its struggle for life, it has made some rich contributions to the ministry and membership of the Methodist Church in Alabama. If its facilities for usefulness were multiplied, would not its contributions of pious and polished men to the pulpit and the pew be likewise increased?

J. W. R. says truly that Alabama Methodists are not "big rich." How, then, can we hope to endow the university? I think there are poor men in Alabama who would be willing to make sacrifices to contribute to an endowment fund—some one hundred, some five hundred and some one thousand dollars—if they were certain that these three results would follow: 1. That a respectable endowment could be secured. 2. That such a fund would make a Methodist collegiate education much cheaper than it now is, so as to bring it within the reach of many young men to whom it is now practically denied, because of its cost. 3. That the fund would be safely invested, and cheaply administered.

If there is uncertainty about either of these points still some men will contribute, but many will not. Let J. W. R. devise a scheme guarding these points, and make his appeals to the church. I am sure he will not utterly fail. If he can raise $25,000 the prosperity of the university will be assured. This fact will make it easy to raise more money at home, and will challenge contributions from abroad, from some such liberal Methodists as Mr. Seney. Let us help ourselves, and make it plain that we are going to succeed, so one from abroad is going to help us.

LAYMAN.

The Harvest.

Under this heading Rev. Dr. Tudor discourses as follows in the Advocate of Missions:

"The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few." It were a sad sight indeed a ripe harvest field, and no reapers. Better far and less melancholy the bound sheaves and shocks swept away by the floods, or rotting in the damp, than the standing grain wasting and perishing for want of the sickle. Xerxes wept at the thought that of his three millions of soldiers "every one will be dead before a hundred years." He saw in the multitudes only a harvest for death—a harvest ripe for destruction's keen-edged sickle, sheaves of corpses stacked by the skeleton-hand of death. It was an infinitely more cheerful view that mingled with the Saviour's pity of the surging crowds that followed him of the multitudes of earth. He saw a harvest for life, and that only wanted the sickle. Empty granaries of immortal joy were waiting for their expected fruit. Christ knew the hidden meaning of humanity in the thought of God. That meaning was not the perishing destiny of the brute. The fields which God had long ago sown with human life, and its large promise, were white unto the harvest. The whole earth waved with the golden grain, and it was time to save the crop. "O reapers! where are ye?" In the multitudes of earth there is surely no lack of material for an abundant harvest, if the grain is worth saving. If we ever ask the question, Has each individual, of every grade, of this surging mass, an immortal soul, that must pass to the adjudications of the judgment-seat of Christ, and beyond to conscious fates of happiness or woe? there is but one answer by the truth of the Impartial God, who is no respecter of persons. It is when men have been dazed and bewildered by the sight of the multitudes that they have at once sneered at the idea that the human species is endowed with a life capable of a great hereafter beyond the grave, and so also have discouraged missionary operations as a fruitless task among such overwhelming masses. But the great mind of Jesus Christ did not shrink from the conclusion that the destinies of eternity were bound up with the being of the "innumerable" (Luke xii, 1) multitude, the myriads of people that followed him, treading one upon another, and with the being of each most ignorant and brutalized individual of the crowd whose thoughts might hardly rise above the bone he had begged to gnaw. He had strength to grapple with the mighty thought that has abashed other strongest thinkers. He knew and said the people could not understand him, and yet he saw in them a harvest for life. It would be a great relief to our minds, we sometimes think, if we could believe that the responsibilities of the unthinking, wicked, and heathenish hordes of men ended with the grave, and if our responsibility to them extended no farther than the animal, intellectual, and moral wants of the present life. But, with the utmost calmness, Jesus recognized in all the mighty mass candidates for immortality, and assumed the entire responsibility of his teaching. He saw the jewel in the mud, the diamond in the rough, the potential harvest in desperate man. He himself organized the harvest. He became the chief laborer in the harvest-field, leading the mighty swath. The sweat-drops of his labor were drops of blood running down to the ground. He was a valiant, veritable harvester. He was stripped for the harvest field, even to the flesh—precious flesh, where the soldier's spear entered his side. He nearly stripped his harvesters. "Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass, in your purses; nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves; for the workman is worthy of his meat."

The church takes too good care to keep the harvesters well stripped much so at home, more abroad. But the church must remember that where there is meat or hire ready there will be laborers, not without. The responsibility is to furnish the hire for harvesters the world over—if not in abundance, at least the hire, and the field will be occupied and reaped.

A Chinaman, Ah Why, a member of my church, died of consumption a few days ago. I do not think he had ever seen anybody shout. On his death-bed, as I sang to him "I love Jesus," he raised both hands, his face lit up with a seraphic smile, he praised God, he shouted at his own instance. China "shall soon stretch out her hands unto God." The harvest is plenteous.

Dr. Jobson's Preaching.

The following extract, from the sermon of Rev. W. B. Popy, D. D., on the character of the late Dr. F. J. Jobson, will be read with much interest, especially by Methodist preachers. It is taken from the Watchman and Wesleyan Advertiser, of February 16, 1881:

But this leads to another the other meaning of the term "constrain." It has been more than once observed that Dr. Jobson was a many-sided man, a man of many accomplishments, of very diversified gifts and endowments and tastes. But it is also generally allowed that he blended, or rather the grace of God blended, all into a wonderful and a beautiful unity. One said lately: "It is not given to many of the servants of the church to combine in their own persons qualifications for so many kinds of service as it was, in the providence of God, given him to exemplify; every kind of talent was in its turn called into requisition, and freely I will say gladly, devoted to the service of the church of Christ." There was a time in his life when the restraint that compressed his pursuits into unity made him perforce almost only a preacher; all his reading, all his painting, all his fruits of travel, all his observation of human nature in which he was a master, all the fire of his imagination and all the play of his humor, which also was one of his specific endowments, were brought into the service of the sanctuary. But after he brought them into the service, they were sanctified by the unction of the Holy One. Again, I must quote one who knew better than I could know: "Although this often involved labor on his part, he grudged no labor that might be necessary to the welfare of the cause of Christ, and he often took from the night what the duties of the day did not allow him to give to study and devotion and retired pursuits necessary to the efficiency of the Christian ministry. I have often"—it is that old and dear friend who still speaks—"glorified God in him on this account, that he would have time to reflect, time to prepare, time to digest his thoughts, time to meditate as to the matter and spirit of his preaching, and so, when he came to the pulpit, he often came as Moses came down from the Mount, and the spiritually-minded might see his face shining with the reflected radiance of his Heavenly Father's countenance. * * * He was mighty in prayer, because he practiced it where no ear heard and no eye saw, and the open reward was in the power that was granted in public. * * * The pulpit was his joy. He felt the love of God for perishing sinners; he felt the sweetness of pardoning love; he felt the honor of being an embassador for Christ, and his whole soul poured itself out on his congregation, as I do not need to tell you at length. The

Bro. I. V. Enochs, writing from Terry, Miss., says: "The measure of the harvest on Georgetown circuit seems filling very rapidly this year. First Mother Nancy Sistrunk, aged ninety four years. Then Mother Elizabeth Johnston, aged eighty-eight. Then Father Rutledge, eighty-four. And now, while I write March 21, at ten A. M., my own dear mother-in-law, Sarah Byrd, aged sixty-four, is evidently passing into that 'rest' for which she has longed for many years. A cloud has rested upon her faculties for twenty-four hours, and we will no more hear expressions from her, but many a Mississippi pastor will remember her Martha-like zeal in 'service,' as well as the strength and depth of her Christian faith and character."

P. S.—Four o'clock—Mrs. Byrd "is at rest."

Rev. G. M. Liverman, writing from Kenchie, La., March 24, says: "I believe I have read the last numbers of the ADVOCATE with more pleasure than ever before. I have noticed a good deal said about Bro. J. G. Jones' 'History of Methodism.' I verily believe the book is needed, and will sell well if they do not commit a great blunder in making it too large. I say condense the book into one instead of two or three volumes. What a wise act in Bishop McTyeire abridging Paine's 'Life of McKendree.' One volume, of respectable size, the people will buy and read. If too large it will fall of its own weight."

Rev. W. S. Wade, writing from Whistler, Ala., March 23, says: "We are making some headway here in church work; congregations large; prayer and class meetings full of spiritual life; Sunday-school very interesting. The ADVOCATE has a very good circulation, and is increasing. Finances poor, hope they will improve, as business has greatly improved in the last few days."

Prof. F. M. Grace, writing from Hiwassee College, Tennessee, March 21, says: "We have had a revival for two weeks. Fifteen professions and ten accessions, nearly all students. Many of the conversions were very manifest and satisfactory. Our Young Men's Christian Association has contributed much to the present religious prosperity of the college."

The annual meeting of the Executive Association, Women's Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will be held, Providence permitting, in St. Louis, Mo., May 9. The corresponding secretary of the St. Louis Conference Society authorizes me to state that a cordial welcome will be extended to the members of the association, and liberal accommodation provided for them.

A preliminary meeting of the Conference secretaries will be held in St. Louis, May 7.

FAYETTEVILLE, March 12, 1881.

The College News is the title of neat monthly published by the pupils of Mansfield Female College. Price 50 cents a year. The following is the salutatory:

"To-day we send out the first issue of our College paper. It is small, and, therefore, easily read. We expect to enlarge and to improve. Our object is to advance the interest of our school. It is not to be heard. Soon we will hear the whistle of the locomotive in our midst. Then Mansfield will be no longer out of the way, but on the great trunk line of this continent. Already the hope and confidence inspired are putting new life in our school. Scholars are coming in and we are now on the upgrade. To all of our friends, to our old pupils especially, we appeal. Subscribe for this paper. The cost is a trifle. Send us pupils. Give us your earnest co-operation."

Dr. Summers, writing from Nashville to the Western Methodist, March 17, says:

"We are printing the first volume of Bishop Doggett's sermons. It will contain a biographical sketch of the late Bishop, from the pen of his life long friend, the Rev. J. E. Edwards, D. D."

Bishop Kavanaugh is, says the Pacific Methodist of March 18, vigorously prosecuting his work on this coast. He passed through the city last week not a bit the worse for laborious pulpit labors and struggles through storm and mud. Next Sunday he is the guest of Rev. W. H. Layson at Oakland, and will preach at 11 o'clock in the morning, in the First Presbyterian Church. Rev. Mr. Spreckels, and at night in the First Congregational Church. Rev. Dr. McLean. The Sunday following he will beat Elmira with Bro. Burris.

The Wesleyan Christian Advocate of January 29 says: "A letter from Rev. James E. Evans, D. D., to the writer, says:

"Please say to my friends, it was a false report about my being paralyzed; I was a little unwell for a day or two from cold, in that severe cold weather, but I am in my usual health again. I preached twice last Sunday."

Everybody will be glad to hear this pleasant tidings.

The Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal, of this city, says:

"The reading of the Bible by uninstructed and uninstructed people, young and old, has made more unbelievers and scoffers than the reading of 'The Age of Reason.'"

When Roman Catholic newspapers express such opinions, what is the use of saying that they are not opposed to the circulation of the Bible?—New York Observer.

Mrs. John Jacob Astor, says the New York Observer, has just sent another party of one hundred children to homes in the West, through the agency of the Children's Aid Society. The whole number of homeless little ones thus provided for by Mrs. Astor is eight hundred and thirteen, at an expense of more than $11,500.

Personal and Other.

—M. Lambert, the renowned French painter of cats, has an extensive collection of cat-skins, of various rare hues and tints, which he uses in making a picture exactly as Veronese was accustomed to make use of his gorgeous stuffs. When he has a cat as a model that has a good form or a good expression, for example, but poor-colored fur, he takes the movement and expression from the living feline, and the color he substitutes from the shades of his selected store of departed cats. He is constantly buying models and is as constantly obliged to give away those that have served his purpose; that is, those that have once been put into a picture. There is a constant procession, so to speak, of cats going in and then out of his possession. When seeing his pictures, one wonders how he manages to make his unreasonable models pose. It is Madame Lambert who daily holds the models in her lap, and with untiring patience helps her husband in his work in a way that no one else would or could do.

—Mrs. Garibaldi is thus described by a newspaper correspondent: "She is a capital nurse and very kind and devoted to the General. She puts him to sleep as if he were a baby, and then locks him up in his bedroom, if she is obliged to go away, so that he may not be disturbed. When they were living at Frascati a few years ago, a pilgrim came all the way from Viterbo to visit the 'General of the Mille,' or Thousand. When the pilgrim arrived it was impossible to see Garibaldi, as he was asleep. Anita Francesca had locked him in the bedroom and gone off to Rome on business, with the key in her pocket. 'But we must see him,' the pilgrim's members cried. 'We have come all the way from Viterbo.' The reply was: 'Impossible unless you can wait till Donna Francesca returns.' They could but wait, and had to go back to Viterbo with empty eyes with the old cry of 'New York, Independent.'

"The capacity which has been found for taking preliminary steps to ascertain whether a Submarine Tunnel can be made between Calais and Dover has at last succeeded in carrying a shaft down to the depth at which the tunnel, if practicable, would have to be made. Although in the upper strata there is a good deal of water there is no infiltration in the gallery, which is in the solid rock. A second shaft is about to be driven, and the directors state that if no unforseen obstacle arises the tunnel might be completed in four years.

—The widow of President Tyler has just been granted a small pension by Congress. She is a respectable lady, living in retirement. The widow of President Polk, still living at Nashville, is so beloved by all parties and classes in Tennessee, that her little income in State bonds, all she possesses in the world, has been, by unbroken consent, exempted from the blood tide of repudiation that has dashed in the interest due to other creditors, Republican and Democrat, white and black, high tax and low tax, all agree that the interest shall be paid promptly on the debt held by her.

—Gortschakoff, the distinguished Russian diplomat, is entirely omitted for further service in the Russian Cabinet, no consequence of old age. His silvery locks and tottering step give evidence that he cannot survive a great while longer. He spends the summer months in Baden-Baden and the winters in Southern France or Italy, having ignored Russia as a place of residence. It is said that his mind has become weak and childish, and that he constantly mourns over the ingratitude of his country in not reinstating him in power as in days gone by.—New York Independent.

The Duchess of Westminster, just deceased, came of a remarkable family. With the exception of the celebrated Duchess of Gordon, the Dukedoms of Sutherland was the only instance of a peeress having three daughters, duchesses viz., Leinster, Argyll and Westminster. The late Duchess of Westminster was the right woman in the right place and a true helpmeet to her husband. The Duke of Westminster is believed to have a larger income than any other British nobleman.—New York Independent.

George Eliot, it is said, was the most careful and accurate of authors. Her beautifully written manuscript, says one who knew her well, was free from blur or erasure, and, with every letter delicately and distinctly finished, was only the outward and visible sign of the inward labor which she took to work out her ideas. She had rarely much to correct in her proof-sheets. Her grasp of business was not less striking than her literary power, and her shrewdness and foresight were such as are seldom to be met with.

The Baroness Burdett-Coutts outshines all competitors in an old-land address. A remarkable fluency with chosen words and a perfect enjoyment and feminine grace are the chief characteristics of her style. On the recent presentation of prizes to the Bloomsbury school of art she spoke for half an hour with an eloquence which astonished almost everybody.

Miss Barbara Scott, who died in Montreal, a few days ago, of cerebral apoplexy, bequeathed $80,000 to found a chair of civil engineering in the McGill College, $2,000 for a classical scholarship to be called "The Barbara Scott Scholarship," and $2,000 to the building fund of St. Gabriel Church, of Montreal.

Rev. Dr. W. A. Hallock, who died a few days since in New York, at the ripe age of eighty-seven years, has been called the father of the American Tract Society. He was an active mover in its organization in 1825, and devoted the remainder of his long life to its interests.

It is said that Paul Veronese in the time of his death had collected thousands of pieces of stuffs and rags of different colors, things invaluable to one composing a picture, furnishing numberless combinations and hints of color that could not possibly be thought or dreamed out.

The death is announced of Etienne Hersent, a painter best known by his battle-pieces. Among other recent deaths in art-circles are those of Charles Timbrill, a writer on art, and Charles Sackville Bale, a distinguished collector of works of art and antiquities.

A Boston man besought his wife, he being but three years married, for the privilege of a night key. "Nightkey" she exclaimed in tones of amazement, "what use can you have for a nightkey, when the Woman's Emancipation League meets Monday night, the Ladies' Foreign Mission Tuesday, the Sisters of Jericho Wednesday, the Woman's Science Circle Thursday, the Daughters of Sunevele Friday, and the Woman's Progressive Association, and the Suffrage Band on alternate Saturday nights. A correspondent writes the Christian at Work: "Quickly get and treasure the heart of the telephone and the peculiar call of the operator when calling a connection. The other evening when we the inspector of the house, emptied a spittoon that was filled to the very brim, we shocked when the operator answered Hello, Hello, Why did you not say that you wanted Hell, when you called for connection? Hell, indeed, forgetful of the Lord's Sabbath. This is sad."

A Scotch clergyman had this experience: "I commenced to preach. After dismissing the congregation he returned to the church, when the sexton said to him, 'Ye're preaching that fine to-day, sir, that the congregation don't look at the clock.' 'Ay, John,' replied the minister, 'and I'm thinking they'll never look at it again.'" The preacher would have been a greater complainer of disappointed hopes, when death was preferred before him. It would save us many pangs in telling worse hurt of such plain speech we make common.

In polite society, at an entertainment, although it may be difficult to prevent the current of conversation being directed by the guests as they drift up with suggestive tales of eating, the well known hospitality of the host will give reasonable assurance that refreshments will be served in due time, it is not the custom to introduce the guests that these things will be served at table in due course of events. But when the parents of a country boy, after a dozen years of married life, have indulged to an affluence that permits the invitation of a few neighbors to a little party, and that boy beholds with rapture the preparations, gets light repast, he will be purchased for edging bashfully in among the guests as did a boy a few evenings since and saying: "You are going to have some nuts and apples by and by."

Little four-year old Fredy refuses, above all things, to be pitied. The other day he fell down stairs and was picked up badly bruised, and was pitied accordingly. To Consumptives. Wilbor's Cod Liver Oil and Lime has now been before the public twenty years, and has steadily grown in favor and appreciation. This could not be the case unless the preparation was of high intrinsic value. The combination of the Phosphate of Lime with Pure Cod-Liver Oil, as prepared by Dr. Wilbor, has produced a new phase in the treatment of pulmonary and all diseases of the Lungs. This fact can be taken by the most delicate invalid without creating the disgusting nausea which is such an objection to the Cod-Liver Oil when taken without Lime. It is prescribed by the regular faculty. Sold by the proprietor, A. B. Wilbor, Chemist, Boston, and by all druggists.

GRASS LAWNS.—Even those who can boast the possession of only a small grass plot will be glad to know how to make it presentable in appearance. The presence of a grass-plot, well kept, is a great attraction in any garden, and serves as a setting to the flower-beds [illegible] The correspondent of the Country Gentleman gives some desirable instructions, which somewhat condensed, are as follows:

"The best way to establish a dooryard or small lawn in grass, is to transfer the grass to it in sod. This, if properly done, will secure a good turf at once. The cost of taking up and transferring the sod is the greatest objection; yet this can be much reduced by turning the sward with the plow, selecting, as much as possible, ground near by, or of a similar nature, having a level surface, and free from stones, cutting the slices at suitable width and thickness. If care is taken in plowing and laying down, the best work can be made in this way. It should in all cases, be done as early in the season as the ground will admit, so as to get the benefit of moisture. With sod about three inches thick (which is better than thinner,) well joined, and set in moist, not wet ground, previously worked, and made mellow and enriched if needed, the lawn will be secured against the effects of the weather, unless the drouth, and particularly the heat of the sun, are severe, in which case it will suffer in common with other sod. When finished, pass a weighted roller over repeatedly, and press the surface well, which is better than to pound it with a mall. This latter bruises the grass, and disturbs the sod, requiring weeks to recover. It is hardly to be expected that an absolutely clean sod will be obtained for laying down, as the clean fields are rare, and rarer still is the clean turf of the highway. But it matters not so much that the sod has a close texture and a good set of grass; manuring and frequent clipping will so thicken the growth that the weeds will soon be overcome by it.

"In preparing the ground to receive the sod, too much care can hardly be bestowed upon it, not only to get it mellow and rich, so as to invite the roots downward, and thus aid in sustaining the grass, but to make the surface smooth, and most of all, of uniform density, the depressions to be filled up with earth. Better make thorough work at once and for all time, getting not only an evenly compact surface, but a uniform texture below, securing the ground against unequal settling. If this is not done, after work of tilling in will be required, making a patched-up job. The best condition of the ground is secured by occasionally working it during the summer or the latter part of the season, as it exposes it to the air and sun, which increases its mellowness and fertility, and gives a chance for perfecting the work, affording also an opportunity for working in manure. Ground thus carefully prepared requires but little, after that, beyond clipping and rolling, passing the roller over in the spring, and again in the summer, to keep smooth the surface; it also thickens the grass. The manuring, if any is demanded, should always be done at the close of summer, to keep the lawn green through the fall, and aid in protecting during the winter, securing also an earlier verdure in the spring."—New York Observer.

A RATPROOF CORN CRIB.—A correspondent of the Practical Farmer, gives the following directions for making that most necessary of farm buildings, a rat-proof corn crib: "Build a good substantial house, twelve feet wide, eight feet high and as long as you want it. This will give you two cribs, one on either side. Put your building on stone pillars, one foot above ground. Side up with lath 2x1 inches of hard wood, (I used oak,) putting them on up and down, being careful to have them just half an inch apart. The gables, and any part of building that does not come in contact with the corn, can be sided up with common pine boards; for bottoms of cribs, laths lengthwise, one-half inch apart; balance of floor between cribs lay tight, of pine board. My building has a string of ties between the sill and plate to nail to, and cross ties to hold the building together. Every eight feet on these ties spike a good strong studding of narrow plank across them lengthwise of the building as far from plate as you want the width of top of crib, then set up studding from floor, as many as will be sufficiently strong for crib; mortice the end in floor, gain the top into the horizontal studding about three quarters of an inch, then lath the inside of the crib with any kind of lath, just close enough to keep in the corn, commencing ten inches from the floor to leave room for the corn to come down into the trough, putting these laths on lengthwise. Then put a common sized door in the end, between the cribs. You can put a lock on the door, and all is secure. I did not lock mine and gained something by it, as I found a stray mitten in the crib on a cold morning.) To get the corn in the crib make doors above the plate the size you want them, the same as dormer windows, and hang the doors on and it will be completed. If any one wishes to have a granary, they can use one side of the building for that purpose, and the other for the crib. The size of my cribs is three feet in the clear at bottom and five feet at top, but I am well satisfied they might be much wider, and still the corn would cure well. Anyone wanting wider cribs can build the house wide enough to suit. I have used this crib for about ten years and can recommend it as an entire success. The secret of this crib is putting the lath on up and down; thus gives no place for the rats to stand on to cut holes, and the building being one foot above the ground they cannot reach the bottom. We are infested with swarms of gray rats and there is not a building on the farm from which we can keep them out except the corn crib. We keep corn over a year until the new crop is gathered in perfect safety.—New York World.

CHUFAS.—Mr. George Watt, writing to the Planter and Farmer, gives the following testimony in favor of the chufa: "I had presented to me two bushels of chufas last spring (early.) After much trouble and the planting season had almost past, I succeeded in getting my manager to plant them, as he said, on about one and a half acres of sandy land; but, on investigation, learned the larger part of the seed were thrown to the hogs, though worth from $3 to $4 per bushel. They were planted late and badly worked—about two feet apart in rows one way and about fifteen inches the other way, and worked one way as snaps or peas should be. The season was favorable, and the crop seems to have been very great. Just before frost I mowed off a good crop of good hay, and as soon as my sweet potatoes were dug from some six acres of the same lot of land, I turned twenty-four hogs, weighing from seventy to two hundred pounds into that chufa and potato lot, feeding them in a pen at night with as much corn as they would eat, with pumpkins, turnips and hunting in acorns from the woods with trash by the cart load. They had the run of the chufa and potato lot in the day, and the other food in the night lot for four weeks, with a plenty of salt and ashes always in a trough, and in the day a spring branch to drink from and wallow in. The result is that they have grown and fattened beyond my most sanguine expectations. They almost refuse the potatoes, eat but little corn comparatively, but few turnips and pumpkins, but go for the chufas all day long, and delight in the acorns. The turnips, I am sure it is, have relieved the cough some of them had and a more beautiful lot of hogs is hard to be found. A flock of some thirty turkeys and some chickens follow the hogs daily and seem to thrive on the chufas as much as the hogs. These facts lead me to believe that chufas are very valuable when used as above stated. Had all of my seed been planted, (four bushels,) I would have had from four to six acres to feed on, instead of from one to one and a half acres, as has been the case, and the four acres, to my judgment, would have fattened better and more rapidly than corn, at least seventy-five hogs, and I incline to the opinion that my sows and shoats would have abundance of chufas to eat that are buried in the ground the whole winter.

HOW TO PRODUCE DOUBLE FLOWERS.—Double flowers are not produced by cross fertilizing. Many plants under cultivation, and some in a wild state, show a disposition to change their stamens into pistils. Mr. Vick in his monthly says: "Florists, wishing to obtain double flowers of any kind, when they notice such a tendency, preserve the specimen exhibiting the habit, and continue to breed from it, by means of its seed, always collecting the seed from the plants having the most double flowers. A flower that has changed all of its stamens and its pistil into petals cannot produce seed; but if the pistil remain perfect, the ovules may be fertilized by pollen from another flower, and seed be produced. Most flowers that are considered double are not entirely so, but have some stamens with pollen-producing anthers. The pollen from these flowers is used to fertilize good single flowers with, and the seed thus obtained from the supply of the trade for seeds of double flowers. We have very recently an account of a successful experiment in reversing this process, and applying pollen from single flowers to the stigmas of double flowers. M. Lemoine, of Nancy, France, wished to cross some single flowered lilacs with pollen from a double flowered one; but upon examination the double flowers were found to possess no stamens. He therefore decided to reverse the usual process, and applied the pollen of some single flowers to the stigmas of the double ones, and the result was that of forty plants produced from the seed, thirty of them had double or semi-double flowers, and one specimen was remarkable for its beauty."

EARLY MELONS.—An ingenious farmer sends the following plan for raising early melons, cucumbers, etc., to the Practical Farmer: "About a month or so earlier than it is usual to plant these seeds, procure a number of good sized rutabaga turnips, cut off the tops, and with a knife or other instrument, scoop out all the inside, so that they will resemble gourds, or cups; fill the cavity of this cup with good, rich earth, and plant in each a few seeds of melons, cucumbers, beans or seeds of any other plant that you may desire to have early. They should then be placed in a warm part of the house or in a protecting frame, well made and secured from frost, and the earth in the cup be kept moderately moist. If kept in a room they should be put out in the open air every clear, fine day; and if in a frame, let them have air by removing the sashes. By doing this you will prevent the plants from growing tall and slender and cause them to become straight, stout and healthy. When the season has advanced beyond all danger of frost, you can put out these turnip cups, plants and all, in the beds where they are to remain, but be careful that you put them out not too soon. The plants will continue to grow, and the turnip cups will soon rot and enable the roots to extend themselves without bounds in search of food and in time become itself an excellent manure for the plant. When you set out insert the cup in a hole just large enough to hold it, pressing the earth well around the top or edge of cup to the stems of the plants, covering entirely the turnip. To hasten the process of decay in the cup you may, before putting out, cut off with a sharp knife the hard rind from the outside of the turnip, leaving only a thin piece of the rind enclosing the earth. A small hole, as large as a ten cent piece, should have been cut in the bottom of the cup before filling with earth when first made.—New York Herald.

ENJOY LETTUCE.—A correspondent of Vick's Magazine says: "There are very few people not fond of lettuce in the early spring. Having removed from the city where early lettuce could be bought at the markets, I was much at a loss for this refreshing salad plant; at least, until quite warm weather. Knowing it to be quite hardy, I last autumn sowed some seed in a warm, dry spot, and in a week or two the plants were up. Before hard frost I placed around my little patch some boards—to be particular, an old door frame—and over this some loose boards, covering about two-thirds of the space, so that there was about one-third uncovered for light and air. It was where it got the best of the sun, sloping southeast, and it was a surprise to find how early I had young lettuce from this rude bed. Of course, this will be of no benefit to those who have hotbeds and other conveniences for forcing vegetables, but to many of your readers I think the knowledge may be useful."

REDUCING BONES TO MANURE.—A correspondent of the Massachusetts Plowman says that for several years he has packed bones in green horse manure, making the heap with a layer of manure at the bottom and putting the bones and manure in layers of about three inches in thickness. He wets the layers as the heap is made. A few weeks time is all that is needed to reduce quite large and solid beef bones to a condition in which they can be broken to a coarse powder, by the fork, when the heap is overhauled. Any tough pieces are put in another heap. He has rotted in this way over a ton of bones at one time in less than two cords of horse manure. The top of the heap is to be covered with some earth or muck to absorb the gases.

The Poultry Yard advocates quick fattening for fowls when they are intended for table use, and recommends milk in any state from fresh to thick. This should be fed in connection with a grain diet.

Household.

BATHING.—Among the luggage of an English family the leather-covered hat bath is as inevitable as a portmanteau or a hat box, and is packed with movables of one sort or another, as if it were a trunk, and the well-born Englishman, woman and child takes his "tubbing" as certainly and as much a matter of course as his breakfast. This bath is usually a bedside affair. The maid who calls you in the morning, lays beside the bed a soft, thick drugget, and places your towels—one Russian and one huckaback—within easy reach, and you step from your bed into your bath.

An establishment so modest as to boast but a single housemaid and no bath-room can at least manage a bedside bath, and it is well to remember that in the torrid season now upon us cleanliness means health in almost every instance. Some say it is much easier in this country to be magnificent than to be clean. At any hotel there is enough of useless upholstery, as a matter of course, but a bath is an extra often not to be had on any terms, and one questions the intelligent culture of a family who have carpets before their bath-room is fitted up. We are shocked at the habits of George I's time, when maids of honor went without washing their faces for a week, and people wore out their linen without the aid of a laundress. We are guilty of some sins of omission and commission that will doubtless shock those who come after us much as the peculiarities of our predecessors do ourselves.

People who have no opportunity to enjoy sea bathing will be glad to know that a substitute nearly if not quite as strengthening is found in an ammonia bath. A gill of liquid ammonia in a pail of water makes an invigorating solution, whose delightful effects can only be compared to a plunge in the surf. To weak persons this is recommended as an incomparable luxury and tonic. It cleanses the skin and "stimulates" it wonderfully, and leaves the flesh as firm and cool as marble. More than this, the ammonia purifies the body from all odor of perspiration. Those in whom the secretion is unpleasant will find relief by using a teaspoonful of the tincture in a basin of water and washing the armpits with it every morning.

Many people find great comfort and benefit from salt water baths, arranged in this way: A coffee cup of fine distilled salt is mixed with a gallon of water, and with a hair glove or Russian bath cloth the body is thoroughly bathed with the mixture, rubbing until the body is aglow. Then follows an exhilaration akin to surf bathing. The druggists sell boxes of salt specially prepared and weighing three pounds, for fifty-five cents. For a delicate child such a bath is recommended as specially beneficial.

Many people find an occasional brandy bath greatly improves the condition of the skin. The French women find it leaves their dark clear flesh as soft as a baby's. A peck of common bran, to be had at any of the feed stores, is stirred into a tub of warm water. The rubbing of the scaly particles of the bran cleanses the skin, while the gluten in it softens and strengthens the tissues. The friction of the loose bran calls the blood to the surface, and nervous, and irritable people find special benefit from it for their minds as well as their bodies. Physicians say the habitual use of soap upon the face leaves the skin brown, and recommend a little oatmeal in the water, or the ammonia suggested above. Ladies, who have moist or oily skins, should use quite hot water for their baths, and a little fine bay rum rubbed over the face, or a little of any of the fine toilet wafers. A tablespoonful in the washbowl of water, prevents that shinny appearance of the skin which is so annoying.

Those famous beauties on whose charms the world's eye rested and never grew weary, Diana, of Poitiers, and Ninon de l'Enclos attributed the preservation of their charms and health to the continued use of the rainwater bath—a recipe for loveliness within the reach of the highest and poorest of womankind.

To powder or not to powder is a question each woman must settle for herself. A fine, fresh, pure skin is possible to anybody whose flesh has not been contaminated by cosmetics; those who have begun fancy they must keep on, but it is a shame for mothers to allow their fresh, sweet, lovely daughters, just in the bloom of girlhood, to make acquaintance with the powder box. It would be amazing if it were not disgusting to see maids and mothers powdering little girls—the rosiest babies—in the dressing room before the opening of a dancing school ball, dredging them as a cook does a joint before roasting it. If these foolish women knew how much more beautiful the child was with her sweet, fresh tints, they would spare them all their rose-bud daughters were at least in full blossom, and try first with fresh air, exercise and pure water will do. Beware of any powder that contains bismuth.

ROASTING A TURKEY.—In dressing it be careful not to scald enough to shrink the skin. Cut as little as possible in cleaning. Remove the neck bone as low as you can slip the skin down. Loosen the crop all around with one finger and draw it out at the neck. Wash, and while wet, rub freely with salt inside and out. For the dressing, take a loaf of good light bread, not too new, and cut into small pieces. Moisten with milk or water, being careful not to get it too wet. Add a small level teaspoonful of pepper; a tablespoonful of pulverized sage; two eggs well beaten; and the liver, gizzard, and heart, boiled till tender, seasoned and chopped fine. Also add a little butter; more or less according to the fatness of the fowl. Mix with the fingers; put into the turkey, and sew up with a coarse, soft thread. Fill the neck and tie it; put it into the oven. Keep the bottom of the dripping pan covered with water, which dip over the fowl occasionally, and turn over twice. If young, bake two hours. If old it will require three or four hours, or even longer. Have a moderate fire, and let the bird get hot through before browning. The breast will be done when you can stick a fork into it without blood running; but sometimes the side will not be done so soon. Then cover the breast with thick paper, as it will not be juicy if roasted too much.

If the fowl is not very fat a thin slice of pork may be laid across it while roasting. If old, it should be sewed up in cloth, so as not to get too brown and hard on the outside. The cloth should be removed a little before the fowl is done. When tender, take up. Pour the most of the oil from the pan, and set it on the top of the stove. Sift in a tablespoonful, or a little more, of flour and stir till smooth. Add a pint of rich, sweet milk, and let it boil up once. Milk and cream are nice in gravy with all kinds of poultry, and should be used whenever practicable. If you wish oysters in the dressing, leave out the sage. These directions are good for a goose or duck. Remove all the fat you can easily, both before and after cooking; enough will be left then.—Susan Busybee

Educational.

POPULAR EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH. The Charleston South Carolina News and Courier takes the most advanced ground in relation to popular education, rightly holding that "the only permanent safeguard against the abuses to which universal suffrage is open is the [illegible] that "the extension of education in South Carolina, will do more in the end to solve the great social and political question of the day than any poll-tax or property qualification." It holds, furthermore, that it is not the colored people alone who need education, and says: "There is far too much ignorance among the whites. South Carolina can not be what her people desire to make her until the State shall place within the reach of every citizen the means of acquiring, at the common expense, the ground work of an education. This done, it will be, as it ought to be, a disgrace to be ignorant." The baleful influence of the slave system upon popular intelligence is frankly conceded; "It favored a few at the expense of the many." But in this new day, says our cotemporary, "for blacks and whites alike, for rich and poor, for the lowly and exalted, Democrat and Republican, let the precept and practice be to educate, educate, educate!"—Boston Herald.

—The Rev. George Washburn, D.D., president of Robert College, at Constantinople, is in this country, soliciting aid for that institution. The College has now two hundred and twenty students, principally Armenians, Bulgarians, Greeks, Turks, and Persians, and but for its limited capacity and straightened circumstances this number could be more than doubled. The institution is incorporated in the State of New York, and is controlled by a board of trustees, of which William A. Booth, Esq., is president, and Jacob D. Vermilye, Esq., is treasurer. The trustees appeal to the public for an endowment fund of $200,000, and $78,000 for additional buildings, etc., a small amount for an institution occupying such an important position. Mr. Robert during his life gave to the college $27,000.—New York Independent.

—The Detroit Free Press urges the necessity of teaching the school children more of the current history of the world. It claims that they "know infinitely more Wars of the Roses and the American Revolution than of the Afghan War, or the Franco-Prussian War, or even the War of the Rebellion. Of the threatened war in the east they know nothing, and it is a part of the present system that they shall know nothing. Yet, with a liberal use of the daily paper, in place of the reading-books now in vogue, both boys and girls could get a better idea of the science of government, especially as it is to-day, and would be better informed."

—There has been a good deal of trouble at Fair Haven, N. J., growing out of a refusal of the school trustees to admit colored children to the public school. A separate school was for a time maintained for colored children, but this having been for some reason discontinued, the colored children went to the white school. Disturbance followed and one night the school-house was burned. The county superintendent has issued an order to the trustees requiring them to keep the colored children out of the common schools at all hazards.

—The new building for the Boston English high school and Latin school is regarded as the largest free public building in the world. It is three hundred and thirty-nine by two hundred and twenty feet with a hollow square in the middle. There are fifty-six rooms in all, including a drill hall thirty by sixty, a gymnasium of the same dimensions, and an exhibition hall capable of seating twelve hundred and fifty persons.

—The Boston School Committee has been obliged to ask the city council for funds to carry on the schools during the remainder of the financial year. The council so reduced the estimates last winter, that by the first of the coming month there will be no money for salaries.

—The plan of supplementing the ordinary work of the schools by supplying extra reading matter, and by directing the reading of pupils, and aiding them in selecting good books, is said to be working at Worcester, Mass., as well as in other places, with excellent results.

—The Missouri House of Representatives has given a practical illustration of its desire to improve the State's school facilities by increasing the share of State revenue devoted to the schools from one quarter to a third of the total receipts.

—The Senate bill appropriating the proceeds from the patent office and sales of public lands to the cause of education, was not acted upon by the House of Representatives before adjournment and is therefore dead.

—The Texas Legislature is now considering a plan for providing school money by leasing the public school lands—no lease to be for a longer term than a year, and not for a less sum than $12 80 a section.

A Modern Miracle.

EXPERIENCE OF ONE OF BOSTON'S LEADING CITIZENS.

[Boston Globe, Dec. 8th.]

The readers of this paper were more or less amazed at a most remarkable statement from one of our leading citizens which appeared in yesterday's issue. The details were the circumstances connected with it, and so much comment did it occasion on the street and in social circles, that a representative of this paper was commissioned to investigate its details and verify its facts. The article referred to was a statement made by Mr. B. F. Larrabee, of the New York and Boston Dispatch Express Company, that after having lain at the point of death for more than three weeks, given up by both physicians and friends, he had completely and wonderfully regained his usual health. Mr. Larrabee was found in his private office on Arch street, and upon being questioned, said:

"Well, sir, logically, I have been dead, but really I am as you see me. A little over a year ago, I was taken sick, but I allowed the illness to run along until on the 28th day of October, 1879, I fell prostrate while walking along Tremont street. I was carried home and did not go out of the house until the middle of December. I then went down town and attempted to attend to my business until the 13th of last January, when I was taken with a very severe relapse. My symptoms were terrible. I was fearfully bloated; I suffered severe pains in all parts of the body and it was almost impossible to get my breath. For six days I never laid down and never slept. I was constantly attended by my regular physician, Doctor Johnson, and Doctor Rowditch also came to see me nearly every day. There was no doubt that I was suffering from Bright's disease of the kidneys in its worst form and last stages, accompanied by other troubles in my liver and heart. In spite, however, of the skill of the physicians, I kept growing worse and finally they tapped my side in the vicinity of the heart, taking away forty-six ounces of water. This relieved me for the time, but I soon became as bad as before. Then the doctors gave me up entirely, declared I could not live more than twenty-four hours and my daughter, who was residing in Paris, was telegraphed for. Still I lingered along for several weeks, far more dead than alive, but never giving up hope. One night it was on the 20th of April, I very well remember, my attendant, who was reading the paper to me, began to read one which described my disease and sufferings exactly. It told how some severe cases of Bright's disease had been cured, and so clearly and sensibly did it state the case that I determined to try the means of cure which it described. So I sent my mother to the drug store procured a bottle of the medicine, unknown to my physicians and friends, and took the first dose at 10 o'clock. All that time I was suffering intensely. I could not sleep; I had the short breaths and could scarcely get any air into my lungs. I was terribly bloated from head to foot, and the motion of my heart was irregular and painful. The next morning I was able to breathe freely; the pain began to leave me and the bloating decreased. I continued to take the medicine, and today, sir, I can as well as I ever was in my life, and wholly owing to the wonderful, almost miraculous power of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. I do not know what this medicine is made of, or anything else about it, but I know it saved my life when I was given up by the doctors and had really been dead for weeks; that it has kept me in perfect health ever since and has cured many of my friends to whom I have recommended it. There are a number of very remarkable cases in Lynn and Salem, as well as in this city, that it has cured. My recovery is so remarkable that it has excited much attention, and physicians as well as others have investigated it thoroughly. I am glad they have, for I feel that the results of such a wonderful cure should be known to the thousands in all parts of the land, who are suffering from troubles of the kidneys, liver, or heart in some of their many dangerous forms."

The representative of the press thanked Mr. Larrabee for his very frank and clear statement, and was about to leave the office when a gentleman stepped up to him and inquired if he were seeking information about Mr. Larrabee's sickness and recovery. The scribe replied that he was, whereupon the gentleman said:

"And so am I, and I have come all the way from Chicago for that very purpose. Kidney troubles seem to be alarmingly increasing all over the country, and I have a very near relative, who is afflicted much as Mr. Larrabee was. I have been to see the physicians of whom Mr. Larrabee speaks, and I tell you, sir, it is simply wonderful."

"What did they say?" asked the manifold news.

"Say? why, sir, they fully confirm everything Mr. Larrabee has stated. I went to see Dr. Johnson, at 26 Worcester Square. He was absent when I called but I walked right into the Commonwealth depot, where Mr. Larrabee was filling up the time of his sickness. Messrs. Burgh & Otter are the proprietors, and I asked them about Mr. Larrabee's case. Mr. Burgh seemed to be the authorized one and said, 'Why, for weeks and weeks every time that bell rang I said, That means the death of Mr. Larrabee.' No one around the hotel ever dreamed that he would revive, and when the doctors would come down from his room they would shake their heads and say there was no hope. The arrangements for the funeral were made, and his recovery was simply a miracle."

I then called on Dr. Johnson who said that Mr. Larrabee's case was a very remarkable one. He was his family physician and expected his death every hour for a number of weeks and never called to see him during that time, for he was prepared for it. The doctor said the recovery was due to Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, and if the bad friends, male or female, troubled with Albumen or any kidney troubles he should certainly advise them to use this remedy. Dr. Johnson said kidney difficulties are more common than most people think and the many symptoms which are supposed to be other diseases arise from the kidneys. He said those ladies after gestation are specially subject to albuminous urine which requires prompt attention.

Well, I then came down and called on Dr. H. Ingersoll Bowditch on Boylston street. The old doctor was inclined to be reticent but fully confirmed all I had previously learned. He had attended Mr. Larrabee, had supposed him beyond all hope, and he was afterwards restored, as he said, by Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure.

I next went to see Dr. Melville E. Webb, at the Hotel Clyde, for you see I was determined to be thorough in the matter. I found Dr. Webb a most clear-headed and well-informed gentleman, and he said:

"I know of Mr. Larrabee's case from having thoroughly investigated it as medical director of a life insurance company, and it is one of the most remarkable cases I have ever met. Mr. Larrabee had all the manifestations of a complication of diseases, and in their worst forms. He had albumen and casts in the urine, and a terribly diseased liver and spleen. Indeed, he was so bad that he threw himself upon the floor, and with his head upon a hassock, struggled for breath. It was on the night when he was so bad and when all his medical advisors had long given him up that he began using Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. The next morning at 10 o'clock he was able to breathe freely, and has been ever since. I subjected him to the most thorough examination possible after his recovery, and I can't find out about him. His kidneys, liver, lungs and heart are perfectly well and sound. I can only add that from what I have seen, I should unhesitatingly recommend this remedy."

The conclusions from the statements above made, which come to the newspaper man as well as the general public, must be two-fold. First, that a modern miracle of healing has been performed in our midst, and that, too, by the simplest means and one which is within the reach of every one; and secondly that testimonials of such high character and so outspoken in tone conclusively prove the value of the remedy and its superior nature to the proprietary articles with which the public have been flooded. The greater includes the less," and the remedy which has been proven so valuable and has saved a life after it was brought down to death's door must unquestionably be certain in all other troubles, which are so disastrous unless taken in time.

Soul-Patience.

"In your patience possess ye your souls, was spoken by our Lord in an hour of solemn prophecy, with reference to the sufferings by persecution of those who were to be His witnesses. But the words of God are not limited, and it seems to us that this possession of the soul in patience has its significance for us even in the petty trials and irritations of life. Many of these are so small that they cannot be spoken of, yet they are no less aggravating, no less wearing in their effects upon the sensitive nerves, and no less distressing than the greater griefs, calamities and burdens we meet. When we are confronted with a real difficulty or weighted by a heavy sorrow, we summon all our resources for the need or the encounter. But the small exasperations which merely fret and ruffle the surface of the spirit seem not to call for such exercise of fortitude, nor do they appear to us legitimate subjects for prayer. Here we mistake. In our recent study of Genesis, we have seen how familiarly and confidingly the patriarchs went to God, asking his aid about the minutiæ of their lives, just as we go to our trusted earthly friends and advisers for sympathy and guidance. Let us make it a rule of our living that in everything we make our requests known unto God, and our living will be purer, simpler and more satisfying. We say this, having in view the minor annoyances which beset many of us, and drip their bitterness into cups which might be sweet but for the dark infusion.

A lady observed, the other day, that she had no comfort at her own table, because one member of the family persistently poured his tea into his saucer, and drank it in that way. In course it was a trifle, but such a trifle, recurring three times a day, and nearly a thousand times a year, and always observed with an inward protest, was very vexatious. Numbers of excellent and systematic housekeepers are irritated by the habit some easy-going person under their roof has of being tardy at breakfast. There is nothing much more difficult than to keep a nicely-cooked meal at the point of nicety it has when it leaves the fire, just done. The person who invariably comes to breakfast when breakfast has been ready a half-hour, little knows what trouble it has been to save the coffee with its pristine aroma, to preserve the steak from coldness or over-crispness, and to guard biscuits and muffins so that they will be palatable. The way to be disorderly people have of leaving their things lying about, in the dining-room, the parlor and the hall, strewing their progress, as it were, with mementoes, and encumbering the path of others with their paraphernalia, is perplexing to neat and methodical souls. The patience we need to get along comfortably with our kindred, our brothers, sisters, children and friends, is not small. The patience we need to bear with the infirmities of the inconsistent, is considerable. The patience we need with ourselves, often taxed as we are beyond our strength, and even sometimes with sinful dispositions and weakness of will, is very great.

Looking about us, we see everywhere how patience conquers success. It is the gentle mother who has the well-behaved children. It is the plodding student who bears away the honors. It is the safe, sure, cautious man of business who acquires the solid gains. It is the wise builder whose work stands. Brilliant, spasmodic and erratic performance dazzles for the moment, but the fire that kindles slowly throws out the heat and the light.

The Lord trains most of us in such a way that we learn to be patient in spite of ourselves. Few ever reach the promised land, and eat the new corn there, without having had first the forty years in the wilderness, and the daily manna from the skies. Until we learn to be patient, until we acquire the steady, steadfast, sweet grace of self-control, we have no influence worth speaking of over others. Impatience constantly defeats its own designs, and it suffers loss.

How patient the Master is with us! How tender of our feebleness! How lovingly he carries us in his arms! How ready he is to pardon our errors, and how amazingly his continual forgiveness contrasts with the hardness of our hearts toward those who offend us! Well may we plead, for the strength of patience, for only as we are patient are we made like unto God.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm,
Safe resting on thy breast;

should be our daily prayer.—Christian at Work.

Sentenced to be Shot.

Farmer Owen's son had been found asleep when doing sentinel duty, and he was sentenced to be shot. A telegram had been received by his father, saying that the sentence would be carried out in twenty-four hours. Mr. Allan, the minister, called to do what he could to comfort the sorrowing family. During his visit a letter arrived; Blessing, the farmer's little daughter, opened the door and received it. "It is from him," was all she said.

It was like a message from the dead. Mr. Owen took the letter, but could not break the envelope, on account of his trembling fingers, and held it towards Mr. Allan, with the helplessness of a child.

The minister opened it, and read as follows:

"DEAR FATHER: When this reaches you I shall be in eternity. At first it seemed awful to me; but I have thought about it so much now, that it has no terror. They say they will not bind me nor blind me, but that I may meet my death like a man. I thought, father, that it might have been on the battle-field for my country, and that when I fell, it would be fighting gloriously; but to be shot down like a dog for nearly betraying it—to die for neglect of duty—O father, I wonder the very thought does not kill me! But I shall not disgrace you. I am going to write you all about it, and when I am gone, you may tell my comrades. You know I promised Jimmie Carr's mother I would look after her boy; and when he fell sick I did all I could for him. He was not strong when ordered back into the ranks, and the day before that night I carried all his luggage, besides my own, on our march. Toward night we went in on double-quick, and though the luggage began to feel very heavy, everybody else was tired too. And as for Jimmie, if I had not let him run my arm now and then, he would have dropped by the way. I was all tired out when we went into camp, and then it was Jimmie's turn to be sentry, and I would take his place; but I was too tired, father. I could not have kept awake though a gun had been pointed at my head; but I did not know it until—well—until it was too late."

"God be thanked!" said Mr. Owen. "I knew Bennie was not the boy to sleep careless at his post."

"They tell me, to-day, that I have a short reprieve—'time to write to you,' our good colonel says. Forgive him, father, he only does his duty; he would gladly save me if he could. And do not lay my death against Jimmie. The poor boy is broken-hearted, and does nothing but beg and entreat them to let him die in my stead.

"I can't bear to think of mother and Blossom. Comfort them, father. Tell them I die as a brave boy should, and that, when the war is over, they will not be ashamed of me, as they must be now. God help me; it is very hard to bear. Good-bye, father. God seems near and dear to me, as if he felt sorry for his poor, broken-hearted child, and would take me to be with him—in a better, better life.

"To-night I shall see the cows coming home from pasture, and precious little Blossom standing on the stoop, waiting for me; but—I shall never—never come. God bless you all. Forgive your poor Bennie."

Late that night a little figure glided down the foot-path toward the railway station. The guard, as he reached down to lift her into the carriage, wondered at the tear-stained face that was upturned toward the dim lantern he held in his hand.

A few questions and ready answers told him all, and no father could have cared more tenderly for his only child than he for our little Blossom. She was on her way to Washington, to ask President Lincoln for her brother's life. She had brought Bennie's letter with her; no good, kind heart, like the President's, could refuse to be melted by it.

The next morning they reached New York, and the guard hurried her on to Washington. Every minute now might be the means of saving her brother's life. The President had just seated himself to his evening's task, when the door softly opened, and Blossom, with downcast eyes and folded hands, stood before him.

"Well, my child," he said, in his pleasant, cheerful tones, "what do you want?"

"Bennie's life, please, sir," faltered Blossom.

"Bennie! who is Bennie?"

"My brother, sir. They are going to shoot him for sleeping at his post."

"Oh, yes; I remember. It was a fatal sleep. You see, child, it was a time of special danger. Thousands of lives might have been lost by his negligence."

"So my father said, replied Blossom gravely. "But poor Bennie was so tired, sir, and Jimmie's sick week. He did the work of two, sir, and it was Jimmie's night, not his; but Jimmie was too tired, and Bennie never thought about himself, that he was tired, too."

"What is this you say, child? Come here. I do not understand." And the kind man, as ever, caught eagerly at what seemed to be a justification of an offence.

Blossom went to him. He put his hand tenderly on her shoulder, and turned up the pale, anxious face toward his. How tall he seemed! And he was President of the United States, too. A dim thought of this kind passed for a moment through little Blossom's mind; but she told her simple, straightforward story, and handed Bennie's letter to Mr. Lincoln to read.

He read it carefully; then, taking up pen, wrote a few hasty lines and rang his bell. Blossom heard this order given: "Send this dispatch at once."

The President then turned to the girl, and said, "Go home, my child, and tell that father of yours, who could appreciate his country's sentence, even when it took the life of a child like that, Abraham Lincoln thinks the life far too precious to be lost. Go back, or wait until to-morrow; Bennie will need a change after he has so bravely faced death; he shall go with you."

"God bless you, sir!" said Blossom.

Two days after this interview, the young soldier came to the White House with his little sister. He was called into the President's private room, and a strap was fastened on his shoulder. Mr. Lincoln then said, "The soldier that could carry a sick comrade's baggage, and die for the act so uncomplainingly, deserves well of his country."

Then Bennie and Blossom took their way to their green mountain home. A crowd gathered at the railway station to welcome them back, and, as Farmer Owen's hand grasped that of his boy, tears flowed down his cheeks, and he was heard to say, fervently, "The Lord be praised."

VENUS CRESCENT.—The increasing splendor of Venus has attracted the attention of every one who glances at the western sky after sundown. She is fast approaching the earth, so that a few weeks a very slight magnifying power will show her as a beautiful crescent. It is curious that the great brilliancy of Venus has puzzled the astronomers who have sought to learn something of the physical aspect of the planet. The most exquisitely constructed telescopes are unable to penetrate the dazzling veil thrown around this planet by the sunlight reflected from its surface. This is the more disappointing, because there are so many reasons for believing that Venus is a counterpart more nearly resembling that of the earth than any other planet. The scanty records of the glimpses that astronomers have caught of it amid the mid continuous duties upon Venus serve only to excite the curiosity of readers. One of the disputed questions in astronomy is whether Venus has a moon. Several observers have declared that they have seen such a satellite. Others, with means of observation equal or better, have laughed at the assertion. Mr. Proctor classes Venus's moons among the myths of astronomy. He, however, put the phrase Vulcan in the same category some years ago, but Professors Swift and Watson, since their observations of that planet in 1878, could promptly show him conveniently reasons for considering it as a fact instead of a myth. Just so the notion of Mrs. Irving's moon was laughed at until 1877, when Professor Hall found two moons revolving around the ruddy planet. Some sharp eye at the telescope may, in like manner, set at rest the question of Venus's moon, and there is now a good chance to try.—New York Sun.

PURITY.—Says St. Francis de Sales: As the mother of pearl fish lives in the sea without receiving a drop of salt water, and as flowers in the Dromedarian islands spring of fresh water only to blossom among the flames of fire, so a virgin soul passes through the flames of temptation without receiving the smallest spot or stain. Let us not be afraid of temptation, but only have a firm will to serve God faithfully, and we will never consent to sin.

Oh! how sweet it is to love God, and to know that we love Him! How sweet it is to weep for love of Him, and to desire to love Him more and more! Love Him, then, my daughter, with all your heart, for you are on the road to Paradise.

The leading Scientists of to-day agree that most diseases are caused by disordered Kidneys or Liver. If, therefore, the Kidneys and Liver are kept in perfect order, perfect health will be the result. This truth has only been known a short time, and for years people suffered great agony without being able to find relief. The discovery of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure marks a new era in the treatment of these troubles. Made from a simple tropical leaf of rare value, it contains just the elements necessary to nourish and invigorate both of these great organs, and safely restore and keep them in order. It is a POSITIVE Remedy for all the diseases that cause pains in the lower part of the body—for Torpid Liver—Headaches—Jaundice—Dizziness—Gravel—Fever, Ague—Malarial Fever, and all difficulties of the Kidneys, Liver and Urinary Organs.

It is an excellent and safe remedy for Females during Pregnancy, it will control Menstruation and is invaluable for Leucorrhœa or Falling of the Womb. As a blood purifier it is unequaled, for it cures the organs that make the blood.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular to which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

FIVE FAMOUS OPERAS.

MIGNON. ($1.) By AMBROISE THOMAS. This very successful opera, first became known in Paris, where it slowly but surely worked its way to permanent distinction and has become one of the standards. It is very full, occupies 405 pages, and furnishes to the purchaser quite a library of music of a high order.

AIDA. ($2.) Grand Opera by VERDI. Composed in the first instance for the ruler of Egypt, and first given in that ancient kingdom, where also the scene of the story is laid. The strange life of old forgotten ages comes before us, and is made vivid by the thrilling music of one of the most brilliant of composers.

CARMEN. ($2.) By GEORGES BIZET. A Spanish Opera, introducing Spanish Gypsies, Soldiers, Spanish Dans, a Toreador and Spanish Contraband Traders. We are in contact with the bizarre ways and locations of the Spanish Peninsula, and the music is quite in consonance with the prevailing brightness.

MEFISTOFELE. ($2.) By A. BOITO. Mefistofele is the fine opera according to Goethe, whose poem is closely followed throughout. A daring composition, romantic and weird, are now widely given, and pronounced a success.

FATINITZA. ($2.) By F. VON SUPPE, whose productions are in a free and easy and humorous way. He flourished during the war. Very popular.

The Secret Told.

Nobody told for nobody knew,
How sweetly the pure little violet grew;
How it came through the earth and the frost and the dew,
And lifted its head to the heavens so blue.

Nobody told for nobody knew,
Why perfect good health should gladden so few;
While those who long sought the noble to do,
Are bowed down by sickness their whole lives through.

Somebody told, for somebody knew,
The wonders safe Kidney and Liver Cure do;
In bringing pure health to the body anew,
And saving from death many noble and true.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 21.—After being out twenty-four hours, the jury in the Kalloch case this afternoon brought in a verdict of not guilty. The verdict was received with much applause and defendent was heartily congratulated by his friends. When Kalloch was discharged and got into a carriage to go home, an immense crowd took the horses from the vehicle and pulled him to his house, some three miles distant.

AUSTIN, Texas, March 24.—In the House yesterday a bill to submit to the people a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of alcoholic drinks in this State was defeated by a vote of fifty-four to thirty-one, the requisite two-thirds not voting in the affirmative. Several of the members were absent.

A special motion to reconsider the vote whereby the prohibition amendment was lost yesterday has been made. The friends of prohibition will consent to exempt beer and wine.

WASHINGTON, March 26.—The President has decided not to call an extra session of Congress.

MAGNOLIA, Miss., March 27.—Hon. Hiram Cassedy, Sr., a distinguished citizen, legislator and jurist, of this State, died yesterday at his residence in Summit.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 28.—Within the last few days the Supreme Court has decided the several cases relative to the taxation of national banks in favor of the banks. In order to do this five or six former decisions were overruled. Much comment among those interested is made on the subject.

NEW YORK, March 28.—The assembly committee on public health continued its investigation into the subject of counterfeit butter and cheese at the Butter and Cheese Exchange this morning. Gilbert F. Hemshaw, produce broker, testified that he has visited a number of oleomargerine factories and found that oleomargerine butter was made from peanut lard, and oleo oils, alum and acids.

In some factories the employes were exceedingly filthy, some of them working half naked, and others wearing only a rag about their loins. When pressed to tell where he had seen the filthy employes, witness said all manufactories of the American Dairy Co., one of which was in Centre street and the other at Broome and Hudson streets. Mr. Walter F. Carr, on being recalled, recommended legislation, first prohibiting the manufacture of the counterfeit article as butter if this was not practicable, he would compel the manufacturers of the article to give it a distinguishing color, and prohibit them from coloring the product so as to make it resemble genuine butter. The committee then visited the works of the Commercial Manufacturing Company, the principal producers in this city of oleomargerine.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, March 22.—A dispatch from Prospect Hill to-day says: An armistice of forty-eight hours has been concluded in order to terminate negotiations. The terms proposed are, that all arms, munitions and other property captured by either side during hostilities shall be restored; that Transvaal shall be granted independence, subject to conditions to be hereafter settled by a royal commission, and that the Boer Government shall commence after the commission shall have made its report. Meanwhile the British garrisons are to remain in Transvaal, without anywise interfering with local affairs. The Boer forces will disperse forthwith, and Capt. Elliott's murderer is to be delivered up to justice.

NEWCASTLE, Natal, March 22. The final interview, at which negotiations between Gen. Wood and the Boers are to be completed, takes place to-morrow. It is stated that a royal commission will meet at Heidelberg. The armistice will probably be prolonged for two months, pending the final settlement.

DURNYS, March 22.—The Boers have accepted British terms, including cessation of war and appointment of royal commission. Peace is regarded as assured.

LONDON, March 23.—A Mount Prospect dispatch says: At to-day's conference at D Neill's farm the Boers definitely agreed to all the British terms. They will retire from Laingsnek to-morrow.

LONDON, March 23.—A dispatch from Berlin says eleven hundred persons, reported in a Times Berlin dispatch, as having left for Bremen and Hamburg on their way to America, left that city on Monday, from two railway stations early. The emigration is so large that three steamship companies are obliged to charter extra steamers.

NICE, March 24, 3 A. M.—Up to this hour fifty-nine bodies have been recovered from the ruins of the Italian Opera House, which was destroyed by fire last night. It is feared many more persons lost their lives. The fire commenced soon after the curtain had risen for performance of "Rigoletto." The subscribers for orchestra, stalls and boxes of the grand tier had mostly not arrived. A majority of the victims belong to the working class.

Shortly after the fire began the gases exploded and the house was plunged into complete darkness. A scene of terror and disgust ensued which beggars description.

A detachment of sailors from the squadron in the harbor arrived on the scene with pumps and displayed great gallantry in rescuing people and combatting the fire which was subdued towards 10 o'clock.

M. Skrakosch, the impressario, was slightly hurt. Signora Busico Donaldy, one of the leading artists, made her way from the stage to the street safely. One whole family of five persons, and another family of three persons are known to have perished.

LONDON, March 25.—The American consul at Nice telegraphs as follows: Sixty-nine lives were lost by the Opera House fire. No Americans or Englishmen among the victims. Public interment will take place to-day. The shops are all closed.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 25.—The trial of the assassins of the Czar will commence on the 30th inst. It has been decided to proceed against the woman, Sophie Perofskky, separately. Gen. Melikoff has ordered proceedings to be taken against the Russian newspaper, the St. Petersburg Gazette.

VIENNA, March 26.—Russian Consuls Mossenoff and Bogouenoff, who are staying in this city, will start shortly to Rome to continue direct with the Vatican negotiations relative to the Roman Catholic Church in Russia.

LONDON, March 26.—The Times St. Petersburg correspondent announces that the Nihilist prisoners will be charged with direct complicity with the murder of the Czar, and various other State crimes. Sophie Pierofsky is believed to have carried the bomb which caused the death of the Czar.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 26.—Opening of the trial of Russakoff and his accomplices has been fixed for April 4th.

VERA CRUZ, March 26.—The cable steamers Dacia and International will, on Monday, begin laying from here the first section of the Central and South American cable southward to Tehuantepec.

When they have completed this work they will return to England, take on the cable to be laid on the Pacific coast from Callao, Peru, to Tehuantepec Isthmus via Panama, Costa Rico, Nicaragua and Guatemala.

LONDON, March 26.—Advices from Calabar, under date 2d of February, state that Missionary Mr. Millum, who recently visited Abomy, found that the custom of making human sacrifices still continues, several hundred natives were barbarously sacrificed at Abomy during his stay.

BUCHARIST, March 26.—A vote has been unanimously passed by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies proclaiming Prince Charles, King of Roumania.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 27.—The remains of Alexander II were deposited in the imperial vault in the Church of the Petrofpaulasky Fortress to-day amid salvos of artillery. The church was densely crowded. The catafalque was strewn with flowers and wreaths.

LONDON, March 28.—The correspondent of the Times at Calcutta says: The impression grows stronger that whatever the government intend doing, it will now be found impossible to evacuate Candahar before autumn. The season is so far advanced that it would be dangerous to march the troops to India. The political outlook is so doubtful that General Hume has refused to allow the departure of the regiments already ordered to start. Negotiations with Ameer Abdurrahman Khan for taking possession of Candahar are still progressing, but he will not be ready to do so for some months.

MR. EDITOR: I have just received a copy of the minutes of the Mississippi Conference. I can heartily concur in the compliments to the editors, and merits of the printer. Their work is, surely, rendered in fine taste and style. But allow me to make some corrections in the statistics of the Forest Circuit, Brandon District. Accessions twenty-five, in the minutes none. Deaths one, in the minutes none. Expelled, withdrawn, etc., twenty-eight, in the minutes none. Church papers taken, eighteen, in the minutes none. Respectfully,

C. F. THOMPSON.

A Correction.

James L. Gilbert, was not expelled from the church, as is stated in the minutes of the Alabama Conference, but was deposed from the ministry.

POPULATION CLASSIFIED.—The Census office announces the following approximate distribution of the total population of the country among the several classes: Males, 25,520,582; females, 24,632,281; natives of the United States, 43,475,906; foreign born, 6,677,360; whites, 43,101,877; colored, 6,577,151; Indians and half-breeds not in tribal relations, on reservations under the care of the Government, 66,122; Chinese, 105,163; other Asiatics, 250. The number of colored persons to each 100,000 whites is 15,153 against 14,528 in 1870. The number of females to every 100,000 males is 96,519, against 97,801 in 1870. The number of foreign born persons to every 100,000 natives is 15,359 against 16,874 in 1870.

The Bonham News, a Texas paper, says it costs in that State over $1000 on an average to arrest, try, convict, sentence and hold a criminal in the penitentiary for three years, and only about $75 is obtained so that he can not only take care of himself, but can earn a surplus which goes to enrich the State. Education pays; ignorance costs.

SPRING'S COMING!

BY EDWARD C. BRYON.

While winter's the sport of the storm
From Kiss all go down and are gone;
They're shiftings of beginning flow
A thaw on the kling rills are seen
Ba given to old surface grounds
Above the swelling of our breast
We begin to say fare to hogans
Injun-nature can be released
Ain't hark, that is a pleasant drum is
Spring's coming!

The cows can't shake barnyard haste
To where the meadow's sweet is bare
Gingly the few green shades to taste
Or quietly drink the balmy air.
Among the poplar boughs the last
The sunset hues with saucy grace
And there's a thrill has left the ray
And buzzes in the joyful heath.
Around the hives the bees are humming
Spring's coming!

Across from some from very hill,
Its icy mantle White Lies
The very frog has lost its shell
And spurns the last subsiding drift
Along the garden paths the bane
Explores where grow her fav'rite flowers
And counts how long are its claims
And yearns for April's gentle showers
While the very days she's summing
Spring's coming!

The sun upon the doorstep shone
Stretched at full length old Towzer lies
Rusk Chanticleer triumphant crows
Perched where the downfall straw sticks rose
All nature joins the cheerful lay,
Her song the varied strains prolong
Responding to that far away,
Approaching Summer Tide of songs,
While the sweet South is softly thrumming
Spring's coming!

Alabama Conference Missionary Resolution.

MR. EDITOR: As a friend to the measure introduced at a missionary meeting, held during the last session of the Alabama Conference, I very much fear the result, of some communications which have appeared in the ADVOCATE of late on the subject. Men can be persuaded to enter into and support a great enterprise; but, ordinarily they can not be driven. In this case to assert that the adoption of this measure was the act of the Alabama Conference, and therefore binding on all, whether they voted for it or not, is to do what will surely end in a mortifying failure. If the act of a missionary meeting had been that of the Conference; even then, it would not be binding on those who did not vote for it; for a Conference has no right to levy a tax on its members for any purpose. But the adoption was in no sense the action of the Conference. The regular Conference business is to be found in the Conference Journal, but there is no record of this action there. How it happened to be introduced into the published minutes, needs explanation, for no order for its publication was given by the Conference. Our efficient and judicious secretary admits that he has no record of this matter in the "proceedings" of the Conference, and says that a note explaining that the resolution was adopted at a missionary meeting, ought to have been printed with it in the published minutes.

Your correspondent, "Alabama Conference," who I suppose is only a member of that body, says, that Bishop McTyeire decided that the adoption of this resolution was the action of the Conference; but in this, I have good reason to think, he certainly must be mistaken. If such a decision was made, a record of it ought to appear in the Conference Journal. This resolution, I would say further, is not binding on any except those who voted for its adoption, and is binding on them only in case the twelve hundred dollars, named in the resolution, is raised on this plan.

If the acceptance of this proposition had been unanimous, then all would be bound by such acceptance; but there was not unanimous agreement to its conditions, even among those preachers present. The negative side in such cases as this is not usually called out. It frequently occurs, at our annual meetings, that a brother proposes to unite with others in raising a certain sum, for a specified object; and those who are willing to join him are asked to signify the fact in some way designated. Who ever heard, in such a case, of asking the unwilling to show, in the same way, their unwillingness? This, they have already done, by refusing to vote in the designated manner. If there are any that thus refuse to join in the proposed measure, then there is not unanimous agreement to the proposition. Will any one say that the proposition to relieve our Publishing House by taking "bonds" was unanimously accepted by our preachers and people? As I understand it then, Mr. Editor, this is the statement of the case. At a missionary meeting certain preachers, members of the Alabama Conference, proposed to raise $1200, to support a missionary in some foreign field. To accomplish this good work, these preachers agreed to pay a specific per cent. of their salaries. All who were willing to enter into this agreement were asked to stand up, and those who responded, and those alone, are bound by the conditions of the resolution.

Now, let us go to work to secure the cooperation of at least so many as may be necessary to raise the required amount. This is the best course to pursue; and it makes the acceptance of this proposition, what it must and ought to be, a voluntary one. If it is not a willing action, on the part of the preachers, it will be without significance and value as an example to the laymen of the church. I long to see a missionary in the field supported by the Alabama Conference. Such a sight will be gratifying to all who have the missionary cause at heart, but I confess the sight will cause pain rather than pleasure, if such a missionary is supported by a tax collected from unwilling hearts. My object, Mr. Editor, in this communication is to do what I may, to avoid the defeat of this measure; and I make this suggestion. Let some one be named to take a list of those preachers who are willing to accept this proposition, and let such preachers communicate to this one their acceptance at once. If, at the same time, they will give the amounts that will probably be paid for their support, we may thus be informed how much of the $1200, may be looked for. If there is a failure disclosed at the next session of our Conference, it will then be too late to change the result; but if we are informed from time to time during the year, of the number who will enter into this enterprise, it may stimulate us in urging others to join us in it, and thereby insure success.

How to Grow Old.

BY R. B. RIVERS, D. D.

In a thoughtful conversation with the Rev. Dr. M. S. Andrews, we came to this conclusion: that while ministers of our church were not generally sought after when the weight of sixty years or even of fifty years was upon them, it was not so in the secular callings. A lawyer, sixty years old, is in demand because of his learning and ripe experience. A banker of that age, is in his prime, and a doctor with the experience of forty or even fifty years has all that he can do. We usually take our Supreme Judges and Presidents from men of advanced age. Now why is this? Why must a preacher be laid on the shelf at an older age than a man belonging to any of the secular callings?

My own opinion is and has been for a long time that the fault is in the preachers. They lose their enthusiasm. They neglect study. They depend upon old sermons. They become prosy and long winded. This ought not so to be. The enthusiasm ought to increase as the man of God feels that he is nearing the brink. His sermons ought to partake of his enlarged experience. There should be more pith and more power. His thoughts, matured, and his sense of responsibility exciting him to the greatest effort, ought to command the deepest interest and arouse universal attention. One reason of the old preachers' failure is that they do not study. They fail of success because they do not keep abreast of the age. I know an old preacher who writes a sermon and sometimes two sermons a week. Then he never takes a manuscript into the pulpit. He makes a full analysis of the written discourse and delivers his discourse with all the enthusiasm of youth. I heard a brother preacher once say to him, "you would be welcome to any appointment in our Conference." And the preacher knew whereof he spoke. The reason is that age has not made him morose, or caused him to give up his studies. It has been said that Methodist preachers labor under peculiar difficulties in that they are compelled to go to new fields. This should not in the least affect our preachers injuriously. Let us go into our fields with living energy, with high hopes, with holy trust and with the power of inspired enthusiasm. Then we shall meet with no cold receptions, but with glad and joyful greetings everywhere. Let it be known that a mellow experience is worth as much to a preacher as to a lawyer or a physician.

In growing old do not become a misanthrope. Do not neglect your studies. Do not imagine that you are too old to learn. Do not feel that you are an old horse turned out upon the commons. Be wiser every year. Be more cheerful as you approach your home. Be holier, more trustful and you will not only be acceptable, but will be actually desired to occupy the very best places. Do not depend upon old sermons.

A New Tract on Baptism.

The Rev. John Lusk, of the Mississippi Conference, has just issued a pamphlet of forty-five pages, on the subject of Baptism. It is a work of real merit. For originality of arrangement, the skillful grouping of proof-texts, clearness of analysis and vigor of style, it ranks among the best of similar publications. The late Rev. W. H. Watkins, D. D., after reading the manuscript with care, said he had no hesitancy in pronouncing it the ablest argument he had ever seen on the subject. A wide reader and calm, logical thinker, this was no small praise. Bro. Lusk has given years of patient study to this discussion. He has mastered its entire literature and writes with the courage and candor of profound, settled conviction. There are passages here and there, not necessary to the continuity and strength of the argument, that some will object to. Perhaps they should have been omitted, though provoked and thought justifiable by the unreasonable and uncharitable aggressions of ardent immersionists. Bro. Lusk lives near Clinton, the seat of two Baptist institutions of learning. One a school of the prophets—and has heard "much water" discussed ad nauseam. This possibly has whetted his blade to too sharp an edge and nerved his arm to a stalwart and almost merciless stroke. He neither asks nor gives quarter. Fully persuaded that he "has his quarrel just," he feels thrice armed and makes no apology for writing and asks no sympathy for defeat or failure. He says: "Our aversion to controversy has been so decided, we have almost betrayed God's truth on the subject. I intend to break my guilty silence in this discourse." And he does it, to the sad discomfiture of "poor Dip." In his brief, pointed preface he makes this promise: "The reader will soon discover that the Christian Bible is the one great store-house from which I make constant drafts." After two readings one in manuscript and the second in printed form this writer can bear testimony to the fulfillment of his promise. He takes the Bible the English Bible and beyond question, except among purblind "bind markers" establishes and Demonstrates the truth of affusion, Scriptural baptism. His appeal is to the word. There is little philological discussion, but a plain "thus saith the Lord." Without ransacking the doctors and dictionaries, the fathers and the versions, he has given the results of his laborious study, in a candid bold, masterful argument that overwhelms immersion logic and pretension. The temptation is to make liberal extracts but space forbids. Let all who can, purchase a copy, and, "after talking," hand over to a neighbor who has been afflicted with a weakness for "much water." It will prove a sovereign remedy. On the nature and mode of John's baptism and the baptism of Jesus, he is especially clear and strong. This pamphlet is eminently adapted to the general reader. Wherever circulated and read, we will have little trouble with immersion proselytes. All wishing to secure the tract and possess one of the ablest arguments published on the subject, should correspond with Rev. John Lusk, Clinton, Miss.

MR. EDITOR: During the winter the ADVOCATE did not come to us until Monday; now it reaches us on Friday or Saturday. The change is quite agreeable to your readers in this locality. We are glad to see its bright face and newsy columns.

Abbeville circuit lies in the bounds of Vermillionville parish, and along Vermillion bayou. It has two appointments, one in the town of Abbeville, and the other in the country seven miles away. There are ninety-five names on the roll, there being about an equal number at each appointment. The piety of the membership is not equal to the privileges they enjoy. With the bible in their hands, the gospel preached in their midst, and the opportunities of household worship, a continuous increase of spirituality ought to prevail. At Abbeville the Catholic Church is very strong, and by contrasting with it ours seems to be much weaker than it is. Protestantism under the leadership of Methodist preachers, has concentrated the surrounding country at this point. Perry's Bridge, which was one of the appointments of the New Iberia circuit, when brother B. F. Alexander traveled it, has been merged into the Abbeville appointment. Apart from our own members, there are several families of Episcopalians and Presbyterians who, though they have no services of their own, avail themselves of our ministry when it suits their convenience. Could these see it to their religious advantage, without any compromise of conscience, to unite with us, it would be to the advantage of Protestantism, and to the community at large. We need a church in the town—one more suitable and comfortable than we now worship in. For want of it the Sunday School has been hibernating for several months, and the congregation in bad weather worship in much discomfort. Our members and friends are able to put up one and complete it, in two or three years, and ask no aid from abroad. The importance of it will be brought before the church and community before the year closes.

The cold and rainy winter has hindered our agricultural interests very much. Some, at this writing, have not finished planting cane, and the corn which has been in the ground for something has not come up. It is said that 17,000 head of cattle have died in the parish, since last fall, averaging them at $10 per head, the parish has lost $150,000. This is a heavy loss for one season. But, with a rich soil and an ordinary degree of labor none need suffer. It is said that three-fourths of the grist is sufficiently fertile to meet any ordinary demand, if it receives moderate cultivation. Sugar making is growing in importance in all parts of the parish, where the ground is adapted to cane culture. Ten years since there were but four sugar houses in the parish now there are forty. Some of these farms yield as much sugar per acre as the best lands on the Teche. I know one planter in this vicinity whose land yielded three hogshead per acre last year. There seems to be quite a recuperation from the prostrated condition of other years. This is owing, in a great degree, to the emigration of some enterprising farmers to the parish from Indiana, Mississippi and other States. There is room for more of the same kind, and all right-minded and intelligent people would be glad to see this class come here for their future homes. The parish is as healthy as any other on the Gulf, and being near the coast affords fine salt water bathing.

Up the Jackson Road.

BROOKHAVEN—WILTWORTH.

MR. EDITOR: Having recently travelled a few miles on the Jackson Railroad, I could not avoid noticing the great change presented by the appearance of the country since 1859. At that time, the woodman had spared the trees, and the pine forests had suffered comparatively little from his vigorous stroke. The magnificent pines were standing in all their glory, inspiring awe and reverence in the minds of those, who could see in their giant proportions, the hand of a beneficent and all powerful Creator. But it was not the sight alone, of the stately pines, that afforded me pleasure, for the sound also contributed to effect that purpose. I had often lain awake at night, listening to the wind rustling the leaves, reminding me of "The sound of the sea," ever a pleasing sound to me. I have read of the pine, as the "gloomy pine," and the sea as "the melancholy sea," but I do not think that either deserves the name. In my mind, both excite too many pleasing emotions even to allow any such terms to be applied to them. At the time I have mentioned, the roads were well shaded by trees, and there were so many delightful paths through the woods, that walking was most agreeable, but as mutability is written on all earthly objects, the woods of Mississippi can not escape the irrevokable decree. The woodchopper has been at work, to supply the saw mills, and heaps of sawdust, are all that can be seen of the pines, while the ground they occupied is covered by a dense growth of shrubby oaks, whose usefulness has to atone for its want of beauty. I have never been able to learn the reason why the monarch of the forest is superceded by this small oak. It cannot be like the phœnix rising from its ashes, for in that case, there would be another pine. There are no acorns planted, nothing has been done, observable to our eyes, and yet there are the oaks clustering thickly around the roots of the absent pine. If not considered too troublesome, I would like to have some light on this subject—a cleaving asunder, of the "knotty point," for which information, I shall be much obliged.

While up the road, I visited Wiltworth College. It is a brick building, of sufficient capacity to accommodate nearly two hundred pupils. The rooms are of good size, with commodious closets, and all neatly furnished. Opposite to this is the old college, a large frame building, very nice looking outside. A few steps from this, is the chapel, or study hall, and near this again is the church. The dining-room is in the old house, and is a neat looking room. The long tables, covered with white and black oilcloth, with their furniture of glass and other ware, have quite an elegant appearance. The kitchen is large and furnished with all the modern apparatus necessary for its purposes. Indeed the whole of the culinary department is excellent. In the evening all the girls assemble in the chapel to spend half an hour in singing. After that, under the direction of the drawing teacher, they engage in the graceful exercise of calisthenics. It is a beautiful and interesting sight, to see that large room filled by attentive scholars, all of whom are engaged in the same healthful employment.

Brookhaven is a place of about two thousand inhabitants. Some of the fine brick stores were burned not long since, but as it is a thriving town, no doubt those losses will be repaired at an early date.

New Orleans, April 2, 1881.

The following communication, sent us for publication, is given to our readers as a matter of news and information:

ALABAMA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

The joint committee of the Alabama and the North Alabama Conferences, on the Alabama Christian Advocate, met in Birmingham, Alabama, March 22, 1881. Members present: From the Alabama Conference, T. J. Rutledge; North Alabama Conference: Anson West, C. D. Oliver and J. W. Christian. Other members were prevented from being present by high water and detention of railroad trains.

The committee after a full discussion of the matter, reaffirmed its purpose to publish a paper, subject to the provision of the Alabama Conference, requiring that two thousand subscribers be obtained before the publication shall be commenced. Birmingham, Alabama was fixed as the place of publication.

A. S. Andrews, D. D., of the Alabama Conference, was elected editor, and J. W. Christian, of the North Alabama Conference, associate editors. W. A. McCarty, D. D., and A. W. Rush, of the Alabama Conference and J. A. Thompson and W. L. McCoy of the North Alabama Conference were elected corresponding editors. T. J. Rutledge of the Alabama Conference was elected general agent.

It will be a four paged, seven or eight columned paper, about the size of the Richmond Christian Advocate, price $2.00 per annum, in advance.

Arrangements were made for a new press, type, and all fixtures for printing, and the paper will be neat and well printed. J. W. Christian, and T. J. Rutledge will secure the publication of the paper, providing for and assuming all financial liability thereof, and it is agreed that they have all revenue and enjoy all net profits arising from subscription, advertising, or whatever source. They are authorized to make any arrangement satisfactory to themselves for the publication of the paper, provided they do not involve the committee of the Conferences in any financial liability. The general agent will enter at once upon his duties and give his entire time to the work until two thousand subscribers have been secured. He will travel throughout the State, and will seek to engage every pastor in the respective Conferences, in the work of obtaining subscribers. It was resolved to commence the publication about the first of May.

Thousands of Methodists in Alabama have been waiting, with deep interest, for the establishment of the Alabama Christian Advocate, and it will doubtless be with great pleasure, that this announcement is read.

In the deliberations of the committee, there was but one thought, the conclusion was reached with the greatest unanimity, and each member expressed great hope of the success of the enterprise. Indeed, with the cooperation of about five hundred traveling and local preachers, and the support of sixty-five thousand members, there is nothing impossible with the Methodism of Alabama. The Alabama Christian Advocate will soon take its place among the religious journals of the day, and will seek to be a weekly visitor in every Methodist home in the State.

J. W. CHRISTIAN,
Sec. Com.

A Sad Note from China.

We received some two weeks since, says the Richmond Christian Advocate of March 31, a private note from Bro. Royall, in which he expressed great fears that Brother and Sister McLain, who went out with him in November, would have to return to this country very soon, in consequence of the alarming physical and mental condition of Mrs. McLain. We hoped for the best, and, therefore, did not mention the contents of this private note. But to-day we received a note from Bro. Royall, dated the 15th of February, in which he says: "Dr. Lambuth, Brother and Sister McLain, leave here by the steamer that carries this letter for the United States. Dr. Lambuth goes as the medical attendant and escort of our afflicted Sister McLain." This is a sad blow to these young people, who gave themselves to the mission work of the church, and whose hopes are thus blighted. From our standpoint, it is a very sad thing for the mission, that two out of three of our most experienced men should be absent at the same time from a field so difficult to reach, and in which so few can operate successfully until years after reaching it.

But He may design to teach us a lesson which we are slow of heart to learn.

Good Words.

He who cherishes a child with terror
Stops its play and stills its song,
And adopts commands as error,
Not a grievous moral wrong.

Cast not by, and never fear it
As the life is made of clay,
Never, never break its spirit;
Curb it only for its day.

Would you stop the flowing river,
Thinking it would cease to flow
Now, or must it flow, forever
Let it take its course where to go.

Prayer is the key to open the day and the bolt to shut in the night. But as the clouds drop the early dew and the evening dew upon the grass, and it would not spring and grow green, by that constant and double falling of the dew, unless some great shower at certain seasons did supply the rest; so the customary devotion of prayer twice a day, is the falling of the early and latter dew. But if you will increase and flourish in works of grace empty the great clouds sometimes, and let them fall in a great shower of prayer. Choose out seasons when prayer shall overflow like Jordan in time of harvest.—Bishop Taylor.

"I will take heed to my ways." That is the sweetest life in the world for the soul to be dressing itself for the espousals of the great King, putting on more of the ornaments and beauties of holiness. It is a piece of strange folly that we defer the whole of a great part of our day's work to the twilight of the evening, and are so cruel to ourselves as to keep the great load of our life for a few hours or days and for a pained, sickly body. He who makes all his daily work to observe his ways is not astonished when that day comes, which long before was familiar to him every day.—Leighton.

When a man is told that the whole of religion is summed up in the love of God and the love of man, he is ready to cry out like Thuroya, in Cobir, at the first sight of the sea, "Is this the mighty ocean? is this all?" Yes, all; but how small a part of it do your eyes survey! Only trust yourself to it, launch out upon it; sail abroad over it your will find it has no end; it will carry you around the world.—Hare.

STARVED FROM THE WORLD.

"There is no greater mistake," said Dr. Bushnell, "than to suppose that Christians can impress the world by agreeing with it. No; it is not conformity that we want; it is not being able to beat the world in its own way; but it is to stand apart and above it, and to produce the impression of a holy and separate life—this only can give us a true Christian power."

The great mistake men make is in the idea that they must be holy to become heirs; the truth is they must become heirs in order to be holy. We do not serve in order to become sons, but we must become sons in order rightly to serve. It is those who believe on his name that have the power, the privilege to become the sons of God.

I have found nothing yet which requires more courage and independence than to rise even a little but decidedly above the par of the religious world around us. Surely, the way in which we commonly go on is not the way of self-denial and sacrifice and cross-bearing which the New Testament talks of.—Dr. J. W. Alexander.

With bodily eyes we cannot here behold God, but with bodily voice we can speak to him; and he makes answers to the man who prays. What we ask in recklessness and ignorance, he will answer in wisdom, and strength.

If we sincerely loved the will of God, and only this, we should change our earth into a heaven. We should thank God for everything, for evil as well as good, because evil would become good from his hand.—Fenelon.

The great moments of life are but moments like the others. Your doom is spoken in a word or two. A single look from the eyes, a mere pressure of the hand, may decide it; or of the lips, though they cannot speak.—Thackeray.

The light of a reconciled God, shining from the cross of our Lord Jesus, gives the heaven of the redeemed its brightness. The shadow of that cross makes the outer darkness of the abode of the lost.

As every thread of gold is valuable, so is every minute of our time; and as it would be great folly to shoe horses as the Roman Emperor Nero did with gold, so it is to spend time in trifles.

The bird of wisdom flies low and seeks his food under hedges; the eagle himself would be starved if he always soared aloft against the sun.—Landor.

It is an excellent thing when men's religion makes them generous, free hearted and open handed, scorning to do a thing that is paltry and sneaking.—Matthew Henry.

Never fear to bring the sublimest motive to the smallest duty, and the most infinite comfort to the smallest trouble.—Phillips Brooks.

Christ is able to help you, and as willing as he is able; prove him in every trial, put him to the test in your present distress.

Christian Advocate.

SWEET-BRIER.

How fragrant is the summer dusk
With breath of mignonette and musk
How dear this hour of rest,
When waning twilight fills with gloom
The shadowy corners of the room
Outlooking to the west.

The blue-eyed children who have played
All day in sunshine and in shade
Among the garden flowers
Have said good-night. I look around
For sister Lu as, and on the ground
I see a child's wild wreath.

By the open door, marked with childish haste
Yon crimson sweet-pea vine has run to waste
In the hot child-shadow;
A half-blown rose of crimson hue,
Forget-me-nots of heavenly blue,
A frail, fair posy.

A branch of sweet-brier. Ah, my heart,
The tender tears unbidden start
To weary, world-worn eyes;
I kiss the faded, fragrant spray,
And memories of a by-gone day
Before my vision rise.

How often on my lost darling were
The sweet-brier green! She loved it more
Than many tinted bloom;
It often graced her maiden breast,
Now, planted where she lies at rest,
It beautifies her tomb.

My little love in days of old!
Youth's morning hours of rose and gold
Comes back to me to-night;
I see her in her girlish grace,
The simply sweetness of her face,
Her childish robe of white.

I smell the sweet-brier in her hand.
I see the garden where we stand,
On England's southern shores;
I hear the rippling streamlet fall,
I hear Lu's laughter musical,
Now silenced evermore.

She was too frail for earth's employ,
Too calm and pure for human joy;
But, like the sweet-brier green,
The memory of her gentle life
Makes sweet the years of worldly strife
That lie our lives between.

Thy life and mine, my little love,
My life to-day, thy life above,
God's love shall reunite.
I kiss the children's faded spray
My sweet-brier's growth, far away,
The land of fairer delight.

Sunday-School Lesson.

Second Quarter—Lesson III.

PHARISEES REPROVED.

GOLDEN TEXT: "Do not ye after their works, for they say and do not." Matt. xxiii. 3.

SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1881.—LUKE XI. 37-47.

Verse 37. And as he spake, a certain Pharisee besought him to dine with him: and he went in and sat down to meat.

Verse 38. And when the Pharisee saw it he marveled that he had not first washed before dinner. Our lesson to-day is a woe upon hypocrisy. The incident above introduces us to the lesson. Christ was invited to dine at the house of a Pharisee. The invitation was not one of pure friendliness to Christ, but, like many other invitations which Christ received, it was rather given with a view to entangle him in his words. There was no good intent in this invitation, yet the Lord accepts it. His custom was to accept all invitations, even of those who were unworthy at receiving so holy a guest, He was always ready to go where he might bestow a blessing, even though it must be in the form of rebuke and stern admonition.

When Christ took his place at the table there was an audible murmur of surprise, on the part of the host, that Jesus had not washed before dinner. This was an unpardonable breach of ceremonial law. A Pharisee would have gone without his dinner rather than eat with unwashen hands. He was as much surprised at the Master's failing in this ceremonial cleansing as a good Catholic would be surprised at seeing one who claimed to be one come in the church without dipping his finger in the font of holy water and making the sign of the cross, or to see him chew with his teeth the wafer, when handed him in the holy sacrament.

He expressed his disapproval out loud, and so that the rest of the company, composed of other Pharisees and scribes, might bear witness to the breach of law. Their impolite notice of their guest at the very beginning of the dinner showed but too plainly the captious and suspicious spirit in which they regarded their invited guest.

Jesus accepts the situation, and omits, maybe, the ceremonial washing in order that he might display the hypocrisy of all their hollow observances. He meets the point raised by their ill-concealed and unmannerly surprise.

Verse 39. Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter, but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness.

Verse 40. Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without, make that which is within also?

Verse 41. But rather give alms of such things as ye have, and behold all things are clean unto you.

How surprised they must have been when Christ took the very dishes and cups on the table to teach them a lesson. He seizes the very plates and cups, which were shining bright from frequent and scrupulous rubbing in ceremonial cleansing, as witness against them. You are like your dishes as to the mere outside, but unlike them as to your inward part. You appear holy, but your hearts are full of extortion and wickedness. You are washing your hands, but you do not cleanse your hearts. These plates are bright and clean, polished from every impurity, and they hold food that is clean and palatable, the cups are bright, and filled with strained wine.

Ye fools, how can you be so thoughtless as to imagine that so shallow and incomplete a cleansing as that of the bare outside of your conduct can satisfy God, who made soul as well as body, and looks for the cleansing of the whole man, within and without. You put clean food in clean dishes; you had better take some of these delicate viands which you have in these glittering dishes, and are lavishing upon yourselves, and bestow them upon the hungry and the poor; and such an exercise of true compassion and benevolence will go further toward cleansing your inward part from ravening and wickedness than all your lustrations and ceremonial purifications; then you would be clean, all, inwardly and outwardly.

For a man to think of pleasing God with the mere form of godliness is like the trying to make one believe that a mess of noxious weeds is good and pleasant food because it is served in a goldenplish. God is not mocked; it is you that are deceived. A little charity in the heart would deliver you from all this nonsense; to the pure all things are pure.

Verse 42. But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint, and rue, and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.

Ye are painfully exact in giving the tenth of everything, even your little kitchen herbs in your garden, but you pass over judgment and love God; you are great in the trifles and trifling in the great things; you are profound in the shallow things, and shallow in all your conceptions of the deep things of the law.

Verse 43. Ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets; you have an eye for the first place in the church, and you love in public to display your religion, by giving and receiving holy greeting, "Peace be with you." We see these later-day Pharisees in men and women, who by their dress and their open prayer-books, and textile Bibles in hand, and thumb on the place obtruding their sanctity upon the traveling public.

Verse 44. "For ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them;" grass-grown and unseen graves, that men pass over and are defiled without knowing it. Your iniquity is so secret and unsuspected that your pupils and followers catch, without knowing it, your false and hypocritical spirit, and become two-fold more the children of hell than yourselves.

Verse 45. Then answered one of the lawyers, and said unto him, Master, thus saying, thou reproachest us also.

Christ accepts his blessing himself with the Pharisees, and utters a woe for those doctors of the law.

Verse 46. "Woe unto you also, ye lawyers, for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers."

You so present the law's precepts to the people that they become burdens and heavy loads, intolerable requirement, demanding a servile obedience to minute particulars. Without revealing to them the spirit of the law, you hold them to the letter. Its love and mercy you have hidden from them, and make them serve God by rule and regulation.

Verse 47. "Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them."

This is the way you honor the prophets, by building their tombs, not by imbibing their spirit or imitating their example. Your fathers killed them, and ye bury them; you are treading in the steps of your fathers, though you pretend to disown their deeds.

These woes of the Son of man give us some idea of that strange expression in John's writings: "The wrath of the Lamb." Immeasurable love only can utter immeasurable woe. May we never incur his woe.

Temperance in Louisiana.

MR. EDITOR: In the ADVOCATE of March 10 is an article on temperance, by A. G. Miller. In it he very justly says that Louisiana has a good local option law, and with him I say, use the power so given before asking the Legislature for more. If any parish is suffering from intemperance it has none to blame but its own citizens; the police jury has control of the whole thing, and can tax the dealers to any amount, or suppress the trade altogether. It is strange, though true, that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. Why is it, in things pertaining to the advancing of the kingdom of Christ, we do not apply well known business rules, such as we are using every day in our secular matters? If men neglect domestic matters to serve the public, then there is suffering at home. I am as sure as I can be of anything in the future, that every parish in the State that has not a large city vote can rid itself of this traffic at the next election; so sure am I that it it was a matter of profit or loss in monied matters I would not hesitate to invest.

This is where our losses are. Think of a laboring people that spend more than one hundred dollars to the man annually in intoxicating drinks. Think of the city of New Orleans spending each year, in alcoholic and malt liquors, more than the annual proceeds of the entire sugar and cotton crops of the State. Think of the danger to innocent people from the pistol of the man crazed by strong drink! Think of the miserable wives and pauper children of drunken husbands and fathers, and say, if you dare, that United States or State politics are of more importance than local matters. As long as the election of police jurors and parish officials is made subservient to the election of Presidents, members of Congress and representatives to the State Legislature, just so long will this state of things continue.

If now, while there is no party excitement, not waiting for the time to make nominations, one good and true man, that loves his fellowmen, and shows that love by his life, not a preacher (this is a layman's work,) going first to God for wisdom and prudence, will inform himself of the evil being done in his parish growing out of the drinking of intoxicating liquors, then talk the thing over with one or more sensible, prudent, good men in every neighborhood in his parish; be prudent, act as if it was a monied transaction, do not let enthusiasm carry you so astray as to expect the Lord to do the work, remember he never does for us what we can do for ourselves; make the arrangement to secure the nomination of good, clear-headed, business men as candidates for police jurors; then stand by them, though it defeat candidates for President, members to Congress, etc., and God will see to it that the end is accomplished. If politicians will bring local matters into general elections, let them take the consequences.

Any one that will inform himself as to this work will find nine-tenths of the victims of intemperance want the temptation put out of their way, and are longing for the time when Christian men shall come to their rescue. He will have to combat the uninformed and prejudiced temperate men, the moderate drinkers and the liquor dealers. Here is the place for earnest, persistent prayer, that the Holy Spirit will send light. If he knows where his power lies, and will use it, he will succeed beyond his expectations, for God will work wonders here, they shall see in a different light than ever before, and, should any dare to knowingly oppose God, he will make his power known in such a manner as to strike terror into the hearts of all adversaries.

As Bro. Simon Peter Richardson would say: "Let me illustrate." I know a Methodist man in this county who felt in his innermost that if he would do all he could the Lord would so control as to stop the liquor traffic in his county. He went to work twelve months ago; saw first two Baptists, good and true men; talked over the subject for hours; they saw and admitted the evil, but the way to stop it was the trouble. When about to separate, without any clear light, he insisted that it could be done; the others could not see how. He said that if they would do all they could, and then call on the Lord to do the balance, the thing would be accomplished. They consented, went to work, and sure enough, with a county town of less than three hundred inhabitants, having seven bar-rooms, another town, with not people enough to maintain a corporation, with twelve bar-rooms, more than thirty drinking shops in other parts of the county, a population of three negroes to one white, we have a law that takes effect on the first of January next, and approved by largely over half of the voters, prohibiting selling of giving away of intoxicating liquors in any part of the county. It would do your soul good, my brother, to see the changes that have taken place. Our most dangerous opponents are now our warmest friends. God has done great things for us, whereof we are glad.

I feel a deep interest in Louisiana; was once a citizen; still own lands in the State; some of my dearest friends are there. I expect some of my children to make it their homes, and I want them to live among sober, Christian people. Yours,

GEO. N. GILMER.

"The Pint Law Again."

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue is a communication from Bro. T. L. Mellen, making a brief notice of another, of a former date, from "Gildersy." I do not assume the championship of "Gildersy" in replying to that communication. I presume he is able to take care of himself, at least in this instance. As Bro. Mellen and myself were members of the Legislature when that law was passed, and as he has attempted to defend that law, it cannot be considered presumption on my part to reply to his since he spoke and voted one way, while I spoke and voted the other. He says he not only voted for, but spoke in favor of its passage. In that I believed then he made a mistake. His defense now is, in my judgment, one equally as great, if not greater. While I believe the "Campbell Code" is mostly a system of good and wholesome laws, and will in the end work satisfactory, yet I believe the "pint law" is a blur upon the statutes of Mississippi. Bro. Mellen, if not directly, does indirectly argue that the "pint law" is not the cause of the increase of drunkenness in our State. He cannot deny the fact that there is more drinking largely outside the towns than of almost any former date. Why is it? The result is as was asserted would be at the time of the passage of that law. Had the "pint law" the same restrictions thrown around it as there is in the retail traffic, I believe this would not be the case. The retail vender has to get a majority of the voters of his precinct to sign a petition in his behalf, and their names to be published a number of days before he can obtain license, while the pint vender can obtain license at a less cost by simply paying for it. The result is that pint shops are being established all over the country, at nearly every crossroad. In an adjoining county there are of four or five within a short distance of each other, where there were none before the passage of this law. Before its passage men went only from town drunk; now they go to and from town drunk—drunk both ways. The cause of the increase of drunkenness is evident. If the temptation was removed the result would not be as it is. The worst feature of it is that the people have no way of redress. Bro. Mellen tries to defend both his course and the law. I believe there are many who were in the Legislature with him who would not dare do the same. It needs only the assemblage of another Legislature of our State, in my opinion, and that law will be repealed. The voice of the people will demand it. Public opinion is, at least now, strongly in that direction. Bro. Mellen says, in so many words: "Prohibition does not prohibit." He means to say, evidently, that rigid laws will not suppress vice. That law is no check to crime. If that be true the wisdom of both God and mankind can be impeached. Why all these laws of both God and man? If his position be true, why have any law whatever? Such a position is too weak to bear a creditable investigation. He further says: "To effect a cure and eradicate the evil you must reach the individual conscience and produce a moral reformation." How can such a course be pursued with men who have no consciences? If any, so much dwarfed they can not be reached? Just as well talk of applying remedies to a dead man. I grant that could we reach all men with his remedy it would be the best way. He seems to lose sight of the fact that the sense of fear and pain is also intended to restrain men from wrong-doing. It is in truth the only way some cases can be reached. If this is not true, why is the child often punished for its acts of disobedience. The saying is significant: "The burnt child dreads the fire." The policy should be in the passage of laws to make the penalty so dreadful that bad men will fear to violate them. Rigid laws, and their rigid enforcement, will restrain bad men. He says: "Fines and imprisonment will do no good, whether we regard intemperance as a habit or disease." Was it then he voted, as he has intimated, with no other object in view than simply to increase the revenue? Did he loose sight of the good of society for mere dollars and cents? Such a course is "penny wise and pound foolish." A fearful responsibility assumed. Whatever he may think to the contrary, there is a remedy against this great evil, and that is to remove the temptation. His policy is against the teaching of our Saviour, who taught us to pray: "Lead us not into temptation." The "pint law" has spread the temptation all over the country, hence the increase of drunkenness. He now attempts a defense of that law. It is, in my opinion, a poor defense of a bad law. There are other points in his communication equally as weak. I shall not now attempt to notice them. I am sorry he has written it both for his own sake and the cause of God. He will, in my opinion, have the same feeling before he is twelve months older.

Working and Paying.

Now and then the remark comes up from a layman that ministers should be paid, like other hirelings, according to the amount of work done. Whatever the proposition, the remark is out of place, and should be rebuked. There is a method by our church law of dealing with unacceptable preachers, and let this method alone be pursued in all cases.

It should, no doubt, be the object of preachers to give no offense in anything that the gospel be not blamed. There are some who demand excess of pastoral labor, and preachers should strive, as far as compatible with other duties, to meet this demand. A preacher should not forget that he is to be an example to the flock, and therefore he should feel it his duty to organize in matters of duty and piety, as his exhorts others men to do. While it is out of the question for a pastor to meet every captious demand, yet his general department should be such as to furnish no occasion for no serious complaint. It is even in order for him to remember that, as the people pay him, to them should his time be given.

But this much can be conceded only in the way of secondary considerations. To base a preacher's salary upon such considerations would be altogether too low and secular a view of the ministerial calling. No true preacher ever went into the ministry feeling that he was simply entering into contract with the church for so much work and so much pay. If this were true, how much out of proportion are the work and pay of very many ministers with the work and pay of men of other professions. The study, the responsibilities giving mental strain, the outlay of time and sympathy in pastoral ministrations, what relation to money would all those sum up if charges were made? I have wondered if men have ever thought of these things, and I believe they have. But what minister ever coveted silver and gold in such connection? I do not believe the laity generally take this view. The question is never officially asked: "What is he worth?" If so, it would then be in order for the General Conference to enact a law recognizing the minister's salary as of debt. But this can never be done with our present view of the spiritual nature of the ministerial calling. The minister has no right to make a charge for any exercise of the functions of his office. He is sent to do this work, not by the church as ultimate authority, but by the divine Head of the church. The Lord sends the preacher, and the Lord commands the church to support him. Support—that is the word—not pay. The church's giving little or much forms no standard by which to graduate ministerial labor. The minister may serve at his own charges, as did Paul, and his service need be none the less. On the other hand, where the service is confessedly small there is no excuse for diminished support. The question is not what do I owe the preacher? but what do I owe the Lord?

Our church is right at this point. It sends out a preacher, not to contract for work and pay, but to exercise the ministry to which he is called by the Lord. I believe our preachers go in that spirit. If they sometimes seem to manifest too much concern about the pay, it might be well for the church to consider whether it does not manifest too little.

ATHLETES ON STIMULANTS AND NARCOTICS.—A Birmingham gentleman has been at considerable trouble in eliciting information as to the opinion of athletes regarding the use of alcohol and tobacco. The results of his inquiries show that the majority of Queen's prize winners at Wimbledon, most of the leading oarsmen, including Trickett and Hanlan, and those crack American shots, Mr. Partello and Dr. Carver, consider the less stimulants and narcotics a human being indulges in the better for his physical health. Private Rae, Queen's prize winner in 1878, confesses that he indulges to the extent of two ounces of tobacco per week, and "a glass sometimes." He maintains that both forms of indulgence are reprehensible, and that he would be much better if he gave them up entirely. Of Mr. Partello, the wonderful American marksman who lately made 224 points out of a possible 225 at long ranges, it is related that he has always been a total abstainer, and that he has now given up tobacco as well. Sergeant Okey, the champion shot of New Zealand, lately attributed his success to his having been a teetotaler all his life and his being a non-smoker. Trickett and Hanlan, who will shortly contest the sculling championship of the world, are quite of one mind about the injury inflicted on the physical powers by the use of narcotics and stimulants.—Glasgow Mail.

Obituaries.

CANON P. SAVAGE was born in South Carolina, February 11, 1826; he came to Alabama when quite a young man; was happily married to Miss Nancy H. Morrow, September 7, 1847, and was killed in a collision on the Mobile and Ohio railroad on the night of December 25, 1880.

He had been in the employ of the Mobile and Ohio railroad company between twenty-five and thirty years. He was very highly esteemed by all the officials of the road. As an evidence of their esteem, and respect for him as a railroad man, all the offices were closed, both here and in Mobile, and all the chief officials of the road were present at his funeral, which was the largest I ever saw at this place. As a man I never knew a more honorable, upright gentleman. None knew him but to admire, honor and respect him. Punctual almost to a fault to meet all his obligations to his employers and his fellow man. Having been the pastor here before, I knew him well; and on being returned here I thought of no one that I anticipated more pleasure in meeting than Canon P. Savage. But alas! how sad our meeting; it was only that I should be in time to officiate at his funeral. He was my neighbor and friend, and I loved him very much.

About three years ago he became very much interested about his soul's salvation, and most of that time he spent as a penitent and seeker of religion, being frequently at the altar for the prayers of the church. He was never fully satisfied of a change of heart until about one year ago, when he heard a sermon preached by Dr. Wadsworth, after which he expressed himself to his wife as being fully satisfied of the work of the Spirit in his heart. Rev. W. P. Hart, his last pastor, says in a letter to Sister Savage, "he spoke to me frequently about living a more religious life, and it was evident that conviction weighted upon his mind. He was upright in life, so far as I know, and when I get to heaven I expect to meet him there."

He loved the church, and loved to attend its services. The last words he ever spoke to his son, who was living for him at the time he was killed, was about going to church, saying "to-morrow is Sunday, and I am so glad; we will go to church and hear Bro. Wade preach." But alas! in a very short time he was summoned to meet the congregation above. Why he was not a member of the visible church, yet we believe he was a member of the invisible and spiritual church. He was a devoted and kind husband, and a tender affectionate father, and when at home, there was no place more attractive to him than home, and no company more delightful, than that of his own dear wife and children. He leaves a wife and four dear children; two brothers and a large circle of friends to mourn his loss. But they mourn not, as those that have no hope, for he lived an honorable, upright life, and died like a hero at his post; saying among his last words, "I am willing to die." May God prove a husband to the widow and a father to the fatherless.

W. S. WADE.

H. G. TURNER was born near Yarborough, South Carolina, Dec. 23, 1808; and died June 9, 1881, after an illness of three days.

Moved to Sumpter county, Ala. about the year 1836, married Miss Sarah W. Pugh, March 20, 1838; she died April 7, 1847, leaving him with three children, Susan, by wife of S. F. Taylor, James P. and Sallie Andrews. He was married again to Martha Ann Somerville, November 10, 1850, she was lost when the steamer Eliza Battle was burned on the Big-tombee River, at Kemps Landing, March 1, 1858, leaving him with four small children, Wineford John S., Mary and Matthew H.; all surviving him except Sallie Andrews. Moved to Choctaw county, Ala., 1860; moved to Waynesboro, Miss., 1872. Joined the Protestant Methodist Church, in 1838; when he moved to Choctaw county, Ala., he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, there being no Protestant Church in that section.

The following resolutions were adopted by the First Quarterly Conference, of Waynesboro charge, February 12 1881.

Resolved, First, That Brother H. G. Turner, was a model Christian gentleman, meeting all his obligations in good faith, to his God, his family, his country and his church, both as a private member, and a member of this Quarterly Conference. His life, his influence and his money, were consecrated to God and his church.

Resolved, Second, That in the death of brother Turner, this Quarterly Conference fully appreciates our loss, with but little hope of finding another, who will come up to the full measure of his character, as exemplified in his life.

Resolved, Third, That we bear with Christian submission the sad event of his death in full confidence of his glorified state in the spirit world, and that we tender to the heart stricken relatives, our sincere condolence, and that a copy of the above resolutions be forwarded to the New Orleans CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, and the Mississippi Methodist, for publication.

F. M. WILLIAMS, P. C.

MRS. SUE TURNER LANIER departed this life March 14, 1881, at her home near Jamison's Mill, Lowndes county, Miss. She was the daughter of John B. Sale and Mrs. Nannie Mills Sale, and was born in Aberdeen, Miss., August 10, 1857. On January 11, 1874, she was married to Dr. Emmett Lanier, of Columbus, Miss., who with four little children survive her.

Mrs. Lanier died of pneumonia, and was a great sufferer before her end came. In her sickness she had every possible attention, and all that medical skill and kind nursing could do was done to ward off the fatal blow but all in vain. Mrs. Lanier was a member of the Methodist Church, and professed faith in God on her death bed, often and earnestly praying for the divine mercy. All who knew her bore testimony to her many excellencies of character, and the tearful company that gathered around her grave was full of eloquent tribute to her worth. Her remains will be brought to Columbus for permanent interment. May God sustain the heart-broken husband, preserve the tender little ones left motherless and comfort the large family of mourners over this dispensation of providence.

A FRIEND.

BRO. ANGUS MCDONALD was born in Marion district, South Carolina, A. D. 1810, and died at his residence in Wayne county, Mississippi, on the twenty-fifth day of January, 1881.

He professed religion in early life and united in communion with the Methodist Episcopal Church, but then the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, never since its organization until his death.

I knew Brother McDonald about thirteen months only. During that time I think I knew him well, and I knew only to love him dearly as a Christian brother. His sufferings for about three months were intense, caused by a fall from his horse last summer producing an ulcer, which resulted in his death. I visited him often, prayed with him, talked with him about his future prospects, and always found him resigned to the will of God.

Brother McDonald was not demonstrative in his religious enjoyments, but true. He was a true friend to the church and ministry; his head, heart and purse were all consecrated to the claims and interest of the church beloved. Doubtless many of our preachers, both of the Alabama and Mississippi Conferences, will regret to hear of his death. Many weary itinerants have found comfortable lodgings under his hospitable roof. But alas! our good friend and brother is gone. Itinerants will miss him. The church will miss him, in fact the world sustains a loss in the death of such noble men, but, blessed be God, we fondly hope our loss is only his eternal gain. The very high esteem in which he was held was manifested on the day of his burial, by the presence of one of the largest congregations I ever saw on such an occasion assembled to pay the last tribute to his memory.

The funeral sermon was preached by the writer, after which he was borne to the Salem church cemetery. There the Masonic Order, of which he was a worthy member, committed his body to its last resting place to await the archangel's trump on the general resurrection morning.

Thus lived and died a good citizen, neighbor, father, brother and friend, but better than all, lived he God, a good Christian. He left an afflicted wife and five children, with a very large circle of relatives to mourn his death.

May the good Lord sanctify his affliction to the good of the bereaved family, relatives and church.

J. C. BROOKS.

ANDY'S EUGENE MENEFEE died in Orion, Alabama, on the night of the twenty-second of January, 1881, of congestion, in the twenty-first year of his age.

Our brother was a good boy. Eugene always had a kind word and pleasant smile for those he met. His was a recipe that brought comfort and consolation. When oppressed and sorrowing it was good to meet him. His generous, affable disposition served but to win for him a host of friends. The place rendered vacant by his sudden death will long be seen and felt. "He being dead yet speaketh."

In infancy his parents dedicated him to God, and in manhood, years he gave himself to him. He went to work early for his Master. Although in his twenty-first year he was elected by the Quarterly Conference, of Pine Level Circuit, Alabama Conference, Superintendent of the Sunday school in place the place of his birth, and childhood yet he was never allowed to meet his class especially so with those of his short was his Christian life. We had expected to see him enter the ministry, for he often said, "I am going to preach," but God has ordered it otherwise and we submit.

As a brother, he was kind; as a son, obedient; as a friend, unselfish; he was the pride of the family and the joy of his friends. His life was one of consecration, and his death a glorious triumph. His sickness was short, his sufferings intense, yet he bore them with Christian fortitude. To him death had no fears. He said just before he died, "Mamma, I am going to sleep," closed his eyes, and was not, for God took him.

MRS. M. D.

SAMUEL RUTLEDGE died March 8, 1881, aged eighty-four years, three months and twenty-eight days.

We call the name of the venerable Samuel Rutledge! The answer comes: "He is dead;" filled in the Lord!" So! as the announcement falls upon our ears, it is robbed of its sting by the sweet assurance to our hearts that "our loss is his eternal gain."

We are better men for his having lived among us for the last twenty-four years. We are made more charitable by the example of his elevated Christian character. We are made stronger in faith and hope by his entry into the new life that by faith he saw us sitting him; therefore

Resolved, That a page of our Conference records be devoted to expressions of our appreciation of the heavenly influence of his life, as well as the glorious triumphs of his death.

Resolved, That we tender his bereaved family our most hearty condolence, and that our secretary be requested to furnish them a copy of these resolutions, and also send the same to the ADVOCATE and Christian for publication.

By first Quarterly Conference of Georgetown charge, Brandywine district, Mississippi Conference.

DAVID CANNON BOYD was born in Newberry district, S. C., September 19, 1813; moved to Talbot county, Ga., where, in 1841, he professed religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church.

He subsequently moved to Louisiana, and during the war was living in DeSoto parish, and was among the many sufferers on the line of the Federal army in their advance, on and retreat from Monticello. After the war he moved to Claiborne parish, where he lived, leading the quiet life of a farmer, until his death, which occurred February 21, 1881.

For forty-six years Bro. Boyd maintained an exemplary Christian life. Decision of character was marked in him, and in his dealings with the world and his relation to the church. He was ready when the messenger of all came for him. His death was calm and peaceful. He leaves a large family, but all are grown, and members of the church, striving to imitate the character and example of the father and mother, who are gone before.

NOT FAR.

Not far, not far from the kingdom,
Yet in the shadow of sin
How many are coming and going,
How few are entering in!

Not far from the golden gateway,
Where voices whisper and wail,
Fearing to enter in boldly,
Still lingering still at the gate;

Catching the strain of the music
Floating so sweetly along
Knowing the song they are singing,
Yet joining not in the song;

Seeing the warmth and the beauty,
The infinite love and the light,
Yet weary, and lonely, and waiting,
Out in the desolate night!

Out in the dark and the danger,
Out in the night and the cold,
Though he is longing to lead them
Tenderly into the fold.

Not far, not far from the kingdom,
'Tis only a little space;
But it may be the last and forever,
Out of the resting-place.

Our Pulpit.

Sermon

PREACHED AT LOUISIANA AVENUE CHAPEL, NEW ORLEANS, LA., MARCH 13, 1881, BY THE REV. CHRISTIAN KEENER.

"Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, our Saviour. Isaiah xlv. 15.

I. There is no more wonderful thought than God hiding. Man cannot hide from God. Whither shall I go from thy presence, whither shall I flee from thy spirit? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there; if I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, there thy hand shall lead me and thy right hand shall hold me, if I say, surely the darkness shall cover me, even night shall be light about me, the darkness hideth not from thee.

2. I cannot hide from God, and it is here. All of Godas here. An infinite circle embraces his presence, and the center of the circle is here, is everywhere. All questions God is on God. He is here, there, everywhere; there is no place where God is not. Here he is, and that constitutes him God. Infinite, eternal, unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth. His great eye dissolves in our presence the face of that deep child, and we see him not; wonderful thought!

3. It would seem that man, one little, worm of the dust, whose place in the universe of God is less than the crops in the ocean, the leaf in the forest, the glow-worm's finger in the sun's light, as would seem that he might hide from God, that one man, one child, might be lost amid the wilderness of worlds and numberless constellations of God's handiwork—infinite; the very hairs of your head are numbered and not one drops without your Father's knowing, not one shivers, but he knows the sorrow that turned it grey.

4. The greater wonder is that while he watches over us, keeps us, supplies all our needs, furnishes our every breath, starts every pulse; though he besets us before and behind, and as on every side of us, so that in him we live and move and have our being; yet none of us ever catch a glimpse of him; "No man hath seen God at any time."

He has never been surprised and discovered as he walked in the garden of our lives. The voice of God walking in the garden, the articulate footsteps of Jehovah, our ears have not caught.

The garden of our hearts once beamed fair in purity, where flowers set about were blooming, and trees of life were growing, are now full of thorns and briers and thirsty wastes, beneath whose dark shade serpents crawl and hiss, yet God walks there still, he tries the hearts of men. "There is not a word in my tongue, but, lo! oh Lord, thou knowest it altogether." "For the Lord knoweth the thoughts of men; all things are naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do."

5. There is that in God which shuts out man. God is holy. Man is sinful. There is that in man which avoids and hates God. Man is enmity; he hates righteousness, but loves iniquity. Sin has ruined and broken and perverted friendly relations between God and man. Since the great revolt sin caused, the presence of God has been intolerable to man. There seems to be something in the disturbed relations of man, both that makes holiness and heaven's very existence intolerable to him.

6. The history testifies to this.

When Moses would see the glory of the Lord, he is told "thou canst not see my face and live." "No man hath seen God nor can see." The enthusiastic Israel intrusted Moses "let not God speak to us we die." Manoah and his wife, when they had seen the heavenly visitant, fell upon the ground and exclaimed, "we shall surely die, for we have seen the Lord." Isaiah in the Temple, "woe is me, for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips, for my eyes have seen the king, the Lord of Hosts." Peter's introduction to Jesus as God, on the deck of his boat, when at the command of Jesus they had let down the net, "cast out from me, for I am a sinful man, oh Lord!"

In the garden, when the mob with the band of soldiers came to arrest him, the effect of his, "I am he" upon the soldiers. They fell prostrate, overwhelmed by a momentary letting through of his Godhead. The flash of lightning behind a heavy cloud, "Jacob said, "I have seen God face to face," but thus was realized only after the Unknown Traveller had taken his departure. Once only in the history of men did God permit the approach of men to his very presence, and that was under a special provision; it was a notable exception to the rule, when Moses, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel went up and saw the God of Israel, and to teach us that it was a merciful act of grace. Moses in his record of the event, states that though these elders of Israel saw God and did eat and drink with God, yet they suffered no harm, "upon the nobles of the children of Israel, he laid not his hand." All the manifestations of God as recorded in the history, are accompanied with circumstances of great terror and fear for men.

Man's life though absolutely dependent upon God seems conditioned upon his personal absence. God must be hidden from eye, from ear, from sense. The hidden is not merely the unseen. The eye is but one sense, but God hides from all. The eye sees him not, the ear hears him not, the mind apprehends him not. To see him would be death, to hear him speak would be death, to feel his touch would be death. His presence is intolerable to man. Our God is a consuming fire.

7. This hiding God, eluding and ever besetting man with his presence and power, teaches us that God is not to be approached by natural means. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath entered into the heart of man, This King nor Kingdom cometh with observation. Who by searching can find out God, canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection? It is high as heaven, deeper than hell; what canst thou do?"

What is styled the religion of nature is a deception and is a plagerism of the Imposter. Nature never reveals God to the eye or mind, until after God reveals Himself to the conscience. If God is not hidden, but is plainly declared by the things that are made, then why a revelation? Why a man sent from God? Why a church? Why a Bible? Why not let nature be the Bible? If God does not hide from men, but shows himself in nature, then savages, seamen and geologists ought to be most spiritually impressed of men. Are they? If reason can discover God guided by the Holy Spirit, then tell me why the most intellectual age erected that altar to the Unknown God? Cain was a natural Religionist; he worshiped through nature.

8. How God hides.

In his person. No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him.

God hid in Christ: how completely when men thought they killed him? How completely in the form of servant, in tears, in the sealed tomb; God in disguise in this world, thirty-three years, none knew him except them to whom he revealed himself. In his law he hides, promulgated in eternity past, and to be vindicated in eternity future. His law, vast in its comprehensiveness as himself, condensed and wrapt in a short sentence that a little child may carry in its heart.

"Because the sentence against evil works is not executed speedily; men's hearts are fully set in them to do evil." They think that God does not know. He hath forgotten, he will not require it. He excludes his authority upon no one. Being divine, God is not mocked, it is the glory of God to conceal a thing. On the hidden rock, the rum of human society ship.

He hides in his providence. A wheel within a wheel, the minds of each circles that no eye can follow, no cord can measure. Oh, why does he take the good and leave the wicked? Pious wives children are taken and we and our sons are left.

9. Why does God hide?

"Why hidest thou thy self in time of trouble? why standest thou afar off."

The contemplation of a universe invisible and mysterious to God is beautiful as expressive of the salvation of men and for their development in holiness.

For God as a creator, or as such, is dependent upon his creation for his very existence, and is surrounded with immensity. God has made finite; given him the sovereign power of choice resolve; given him personality. He has given him a law and weighted him responsibility. The law is the sanctity of God lives by, holy just and true; its essence love, its principle justice, its end holiness. Like its author, it is eternal and infinite in its sanctions, penalties and obligations. Reason is to live the most five under these conditions. But sin has disturbed him in his relations to this law. How shall he be reclaimed? How shall he be awakened to this law, and to a proper conception of his high calling? How impress him with a sense of his personal unworthiness, his polygonal nothingness, his destiny, holiness?

God does it by giving him his law and retiring and hiding himself. He gives men with his word of promise and faith, etc. To awaken men to a realization of their own personal unworthiness. He attracts their attention to that which is out of the sphere of sense and time, by himself retiring out of sight and beyond time. He enacts his laws before time and puts them rewards and penalties after time in the far future.

He raises the richest prizes and crowns and scepters, and hangs them high in heaven. He excites by a thousand exceeding great and precious promises, the language and pictures of the prophets, which cause strong impression of the mind, and urge it pressing forward to the mark. He projects the revelation of promise. He has kept us ages alive with expectation, looking as a Savior; anxious for his kingdom; waiting for the comforter; waiting for the bridegroom; waiting for the coming of salvation. So we have been looking and waiting and warning. Shutting the eyes of our soul, under the habit of our soul is to look at something. We look not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen, for the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal.

"So long as by faith he calls us to look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen, so long he is hiding from us. We walk by faith, not by sight during the present life. Faith is sight-in-reserve, sight upon the basis of the previous vision. The scriptures are full of references to the hiding of God's face, and the withdrawing of his presence, as a punishment for sin. If men are to be saved, it must be by faith, and therefore God must hide. Were God personal in his law and his agent, authority, to man, who depends on him for his very breath, there would be no virtue, no merit, no sin. See a boy in his father's presence, now see him when his father is away, what a difference! How reverential, how obedient, how obsequious would were God was at hand, in sight ready to visit any violation of his law with instant punishment. If men are to be saved, and not lost, God must retire just where he is. Suppose the sun should come near the earth; long before it reached us, this earth would melt. If the earth drew nigh the sun, and long before the millions of miles were passed this earth would disappear as a white cloud of vapor, and be lost in the flaming atmosphere of the sun.

All of God is in his promises, and all of man's life is faith. Our dependence upon God, and God's absence from us are overcome by faith. By faith we see God, by faith we have access to him. Though unseen we love him. We are more blessed, though having not seen, we believe. By faith only can man be holy; the just shall live by faith. This is the victory that overcomes the world, even our faith.

"The Presbyterian Church in Ireland issues three monthly publications, and they say: "If our people are to contribute to missions, they must be informed as to the spiritual darkness which exists, and the efforts which are being made to bring both the Jews and Gentiles to Christ. If the splendid openings for the truth which now exist at home and abroad were better known, more would be done to feed the hungry with the bread of life."

MISSIONARY.

—The graduating exercises of the Bareilly Theological Seminary in India, founded by the Rev. D. W. Thomas, occurred December 13-17. The class numbers thirteen, and is the largest yet sent forth. The students have, during their course, been employed, also, in the practical work of evangelization. The Lucknow Witness says of members of the class: "Four of the men were originally of low caste, but have applied themselves so diligently that one of them stands at the head of his class, and all four are among the best; their development has been a matter both of surprise and pleasure to their friends and teachers. Five were Sikhs from the Moradabad country. One of the leading men, Ishri Pershad, was formerly a Bairgiguru of the Badaon District. He succeeded his father in the gurnship, and had about three hundred disciples, among whom he ministrated. He made journeys to Allahabad and elsewhere, seeking rest for his soul; poured pitcher after pitcher of water upon his head in the coldest weather, thinking thus to get rid of his sin, but all in vain. At last a copy of the Dharm Tula fell into his hands. This led him to the nearest missionary, the Rev. Dr. Hoskins, through whose influence he was baptized, and, after some instruction, sent to a Theological School. He now goes back to labor among the Pholas with the rest in his soul and the love of Christ in his heart. What a lesson of encouragement to the mela preachers, colporteurs, and other laborers! The seemingly sleepy, indifferent half clad Bairagi, sitting on a mat by the river's brink, may by divine grace be transformed into an earnest Christian worker, "clothed, and in his right mind."

One of the stations of the London missionary Society's Tanganyika Mission is at Mowa, in Ugulu, on the western shore of the Lake. Mr. Hutley in the February number of the Chronicle of the Society, gives a very interesting sketch of the country and its people. The port of Ugulu in which the station is situated is north of the Lukuga, and contains 15,000 or 20,000 people. The Waguhu are peaceable and industrious, generally, and indulge in drink chiefly after harvest; but liquor does not make them at all quarrelsome—quite the reverse. They have numerous slaves, who, with their wives, assist the men in their gardens or catch fish for them in the lake. The people give great attention to the dressing of their hair, the women are profusely tattooed, and the men have their front teeth chipped. Their clothing is somewhat scanty. The government in one part of Ujiji is carried on by slaves for another. The chiefs have a great many wives, sometimes several hundred. The huts are usually two or three in number, and, to exhibit their love outside, are built of wattle and mud plaster. The young people and some times the women dance, but Mr. Hutley never saw the men dancing. One of the singular customs is that each house hold has two sets of kitchen utensils, one for the males and the other for the females. The sexes are always kept separate. And those who die of the fire in one kitchen are cook, it must be lighted from another of the same kind; otherwise it is not to go. When a native was invited to eat with Mr. Hutley's servants, he first asked where they got the fire to cook with; and, on learning, he refused to eat in the cook, saying it was not chiriri. All wear charms, for protection from evil spirits. Their idea of Heaven is that it is a place where the good are gathered and where the bad are shut out."—New York Independent.

—"The Dark Continent" is receiving light from all points of the compass. The latest dispatch to the African Society in Germany announces that Dr. Lenz, who left Timbuctoo on the 3d of November, arrived at Medine, the first French fort in the Senegal Country, in good health, and on the 23d the same month the port of St. Louis, on the West Coast, thus demonstrating the possibility of the French project of a line of rail between these ports. A German trading house is also to work out this same route in the enterprise of opening the coffee culture further south, the seat to Gabon country, where a professional botanist, in the person of Soyaux, has studied for the better and introduced the coffee plantations in the woods. The plantation lies 1,500 meters above the sea. Dr. Gabon has already established negroes the coffee with it and is planting up the primitive forest preparing it for the culture. The coffee trees are taken from there, and some of them are now from five to six years. They soon reducing bore and mates into husbandry.

Comforting God's People.

The ministry is specially charged with this duty. Theirs is the office of consolation. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people," was the message given to the prophet, and it is also a part of the great commission given to the preacher of the gospel.

God's people are an afflicted people. The ordinary calamities of life fall to their lot. Sorrows are sown thick along the path of many of them, and nearly all, soon or late, are made to drink of the bitter cup of misfortune. Religion does not exempt its possessors from pain and trouble. Among the most holy and devoted servants of God may be found instances of the most severe affliction. There is need of comfort, and it is alike the duty and privilege of the preacher to console those that are in distress.

The fact that Christians suffer is too manifest to call for proof. The reason of it is one chief element in the balm which the gospel offers. Trial is a part of our earthly probation, and its purpose is for discipline. God's paternal love is exhibited in the afflictions of his children. For spiritual ends, for the development of character, and to prepare us for the heavenly home, he has appointed these fiery trials. That they are of God, and that they have a high and loving purpose, are sufficient reasons for quiet and joyous endurance. With the assurance that all things work together for good to them that love God, there is no room for despondency. If God's particular and tender care is over his children, and if this conviction be strong in them, there is no occasion for misgiving. With the sure revelation of a future life, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal blessedness, the present pain is of small moment. There is comfort in this blessed hope that asserts itself in the most desperate straits of life, and that triumphs over temporal misfortunes.

The people of God are to be comforted, not only because they need it, but also because they are in a condition to receive consolation. The strong consolation is possible only to those who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before them. It is in fact impossible to comfort the impenitent and the unbelieving. Real comfort must flow from the Divine promises, from Christ as our accepted Saviour, and from the hope that is born of the witness of the Spirit. For those who persist in sin, and in opposition to God, there can be no particle of consolation. They deliberately place themselves beyond the reach of the great antidote to human sorrow. But the people of God have need to be reminded of the richness of their inheritance of grace, and to be directed to the abundant resources of comfort which their faith contains.

However we may explain it, there are Christians who do not seem to know how to summon the reserves of consolation in the time of trial. There is bewilderment under the shock of sorrow, and sometimes a spirit of murmuring and distrust. With a cordial for every wound within reach, the hand that should be stretched forth is paralyzed. Just when the vision of the unseen world should be most clear and penetrating, the eyes of faith are holden. Until trouble came the office of consolation in religion was subordinate, and but little considered, and, when the sudden blow fell, the refuge seemed to be shrouded in mist, and wrapped in the obscurity of a far-off object. It is well to keep the elements of religious consolation in hand, so that when the emergency arises, and the fierce storm comes down upon us, we may be ready. For whatever reason the fact remains, that tried and afflicted saints stand in need of this special ministry of comfort. The firm foundation, although built upon, must be measured and analyzed, and its deep and abiding character recalled to those who feel the shock of an unwonted conflict.

There are "sons of consolation," those who have a special aptitude to help and strengthen weak and troubled souls. In temperament they are sympathetic, in discernment they detest the rooted sorrow, and, because they have trodden the path of affliction themselves, they are graciously qualified to succor those that are tempted. There are "sons of thunder," and also "sons of consolation," but the complete ministry is that which combines the two. It may not be possible in all, in an equal degree, and yet it is an excellence to be aimed at. To comfort is most Christ-like, and to be envied is he who is wise and strong in this ministry of consolation. In every congregation are troubled, tempted, discouraged disciples. They are waiting and hungering for a crum of comfort, [illegible] and longing for the hand that shall lead them "beside the still waters."

The ministry of consolation is in accord with the office and work of the Holy Spirit as the comforter. We may be sure that he is present to seal the message, to illumine the heart and to apply the promises. It is a work in which we may suppose the Spirit specially delights. The methods and expedients of Divine love are often severe, but their end in holiness is a supreme and everlasting consolation. It is the privilege of the man of God to be a co-worker with the triune God in this blessed work of bringing forth the wealth of consolation from the treasury of faith, and to comfort the people of God.

How It Happened.

Mr. Seney's gift of $30,000 to Emory College, Ga., has created a decided sensation, and several explanations have been given of it. The wonder and surprise grew not out of the gift, but out of the fact that it was given to a Southern College. Dr. Haygood, moreover, declares that he never asked for it—that it came without his seeking. The genial Dr. Fuller, of the Atlanta Advocate, says the Methodist, "brutally intimates that the gift was made to secure circulation for the Methodist and business for the Metropolitan Bank." And again: "The charge preferred against Dr. Haygood, president of Emory College, and Senator Gordon, of making truculent speech and prayer within the walls of Emory College, is contradicted in such ways as to leave no doubt that it is false. The Atlanta Advocate did not invent it, but it has been too willing to believe and repeat it." We infer, from what the editor of the Methodist says, that Mr. Seney is the chief financial prop of that paper, a circumstance that greatly increases our respect for Mr. Seney and his sagacious benevolence. What better thing can a rich man do than to publish a good religious newspaper? Dr. Wheeler says: "This paper is not a personal organ of Mr. Seney. Our instructions have always run: 'Make as good a family religious paper as you can.' And for six years we have had no other instructions, hints or suggestions." What a tissue of mean insinuations. Dr. Haygood truculent, even in his public prayers, and Mr. Seney simply intent on advertising his business!

In the same number of the Methodist, from which we have just quoted, the venerable associate editor, Dr. Curry, mildly condemns Dr. Fuller, and apologizes for him at the same time, and gives his version of how it happened. Dr. Curry says:

That action has a history which now must be told. On last Thanksgiving-day, Dr. Haygood, the president of that college, delivered a rather remarkable sermon, considering its author and the place of its delivery, on the political and social questions of the day, in which he plead for the sincere acceptance by the South, of the issues of the late war—in hearty good faith and cheerfulness—and that, too, not only as a hard necessity, but also and chiefly because the changes wrought were for the better rather than for the worse. The whole tone and spirit of the discourse were admirable; and as delivered by a Southern man, to a Southern audience, on a national holiday, and without any reference to its being read in another latitude, it seemed to be especially significant, and prophetic of a better spirit awakening in certain influential quarters in the South. This sermon was afterward published; it made its first appearance in the Christian Advocate of this city—and it elicited a large amount of emphatically favorable criticism from the Northern press, both secular and religious. It was afterward published in pamphlet form, and widely circulated. Afterward, when Dr. Haygood visited this city, he saw Mr. Seney, and out of that interview came the first donation (unsolicited by the receiver;) and further correspondence, and fuller information respecting the character and wants of the institution, induced a further gift of double the first amount.

This is all very well, and very handsomely said. The gift of Mr. Seney was brought about by the Thanksgiving sermon—a better result than falls to the lot of most Thanksgiving sermons, and of course wholly unexpected to the preacher. But what shall we say of Dr. Curry's closing paragraph—his summing up of the matter?

We may say further—the writer speaking for himself—that the whole state of the case seems to us to make Mr. Seney's gift to Emory College especially opportune. It comes as a favorable recognition of Dr. Haygood's Thanksgiving sermon, and as an assurance to the Southern Methodists, and people, that whenever they shall put them right on the record, the people of the North are ready to recognize that fact, and to duly appreciate it. The M. E. Church is to the South, because it is needed there, and because a form of Methodism, other and different from the sectional species that prevails in those parts, is called for, and has the right to be there. If, however, that form of Methodism shall come over to us in its spirit and teaching, in its bearings toward the government, and its treatment of the African-American portions of their people, we will rejoice to extend to them the right hand of fellowship; and should the two Methodisms, having become one in spirit, melt into a single organization, we should not mourn over the event, even should it result in giving our own Dr. Fuller a seat among their BENCH of bishops. In a most effectual manner Mr. Seney's donation emphasizes at once the good-will of our own Methodism to that of the South, and our requirement of them that they shall put themselves right on the record. This, to a large extent, Dr. Haygood's sermon does; and that good deed is worthy of the recognition that it has received.

Mr. Seney's gift to Emory comes "as an assurance to the Southern Methodists and people that whenever they shall put them right on the record the people of the North are ready to recognize that fact, and to duly appreciate it." Furthermore, Mr. Seney's donation "emphasizes at once the good will of our Methodism to that of the South, and our requirement of them that they shall put themselves right on the record." Dr. Haygood may well pray to be delivered from his friends if Dr. Curry truly speaks for them, and if he correctly interprets the meaning of Mr. Seney's munificent donation. We are not prepared to believe that Dr. Haygood, or the Georgia Methodists, would be willing to pay such a price for Northern Methodist money. We have a better opinion of Mr. Seney than Dr. Curry seems to have. This "putting of themselves right on the record," as Northern Methodists regard the right, as the condition of their gifts, has a very mercenary ring. Dr. Curry points out the path to college endowments, and to all manner of generous and fraternal favors. Mr. Seney's gift emphasizes "the requirement" of the Northern brethren. If religious men could be capable of such pusillanimity, what word of censure could we have for the politicians, such as Malone, who sell out for patronage and public plunder? Dr. Fuller's intimation that Dr. Haygood was truculent, and that Mr. Seney was mercenary, may be brutal, but Dr. Curry's estimate of them is certainly anything but flattering. For ourselves, we prefer to believe that Mr. Seney gave the money to Emory because he is a noble Christian philanthropist, and that Dr. Haygood accepted it with no intent or thought of having put himself "right on the record." We do not believe that Bishop Pierce and the other trustees of Emory would accept the donation upon any such condition.

The Paramount Question of the Day.

It is one of the hopeful signs of the times that the utter suppression of the ordinary traffic in ardent spirits has at last come to be, perhaps, the paramount question of the day. Church and State are alike interested in its decision. The church has long begged and persuaded, and now the State is asked to compel men to quit killing themselves drinking, by the very simple and certainly successful plan of taking all temptation to drink out of their way. The question is no longer of regulating the sale, or of moderating the drinking of intoxicating liquors, but whether at one fell stroke to lay the monster low forever. Throughout these United States the question of how to rid ourselves of the stupendous and ever-increasing evil of intemperance is being discussed and acted upon as never before. The pulpit, the press and the rostrum have exhausted language in portraying its evils. Statisticians have striven in vain to reckon its ravages upon life, property and happiness. Now the sober sense of the people invokes the strong arm of the law to protect society from utter ruin. Yes, the work is being done. One of the younger States, Kansas, has taken the lead, and passed a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks in the State, except for medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes, and has guarded the sale for the latter purposes with the most minute and exact restrictions. The Kansas law seems to be a model of completeness.

The North Carolina Legislature has passed a law forbidding the manufacture and sale of all distilled and malt liquors, except wine and cider, in that State. This law is referred to the people of the State for ratification. There will doubtless be a great effort made to defeat the law before the people, and money and whisky may be expected to flow freely to perpetuate the curse. Distinguished politicians in other States are said to have warned Legislatures not to pass prohibitory laws, on the ground that it would be undemocratic to do so. It is to be hoped that no political party will undertake to champion the cause of whisky. If politicians will allow the good sense of the people to act freely on this question the nation will, at no distant day, be rid of drunkenness. Let it be borne in mind that the love of strong drink is only an acquired appetite, and is not one of the inherent evil propensities of our nature.

We need not ask God to undo what we have wilfully done. The modern methods of distilling, though known only for the last eighty years, have flooded the world with intoxicating drinks. It is high time that whisky and pistols were put out of the world; yes, out of the world. The enlightened Christian judgment of the day will decide, whenever the opportunity is offered, that though they be in some possible cases useful, yet their abuse is so universal and calamitous that they should no longer be tolerated. Why not appoint a day for the universal execration of the man who invented pistols. It is a very gratifying fact that many who sell intoxicating drinks, as well as many who indulge in their excessive use, will welcome any legislation which stops the traffic. They sell and drink because others do, but would be glad to quit, or rather be stopped, for they cannot quit without help. Rev. R. Abbey and others formed the first temperance society in the Southern States, in the city of Natchez, in 1827, and Hon. J. F. H. Claiborne made the first temperance speech ever made in Mississippi, before that society, in the same year, so soon as they acquired strength and courage enough to show themselves in public. The battle for temperance has been long and earnestly maintained by all the churches and by many societies organized for that specific purpose. Mississippi must not be behind her sister States in this grandest of modern civil movements.

All honor to Kansas for the heroic step she has taken. True, she has not exempted even wine for sacramental purposes, yet a few pounds of raisins will afford at any time enough of the juice of the grape to answer all our needs in celebrating the Supper.

We look with hopeful joy to the first of May, when the Kansas law goes into effect, and pray that the days of her people may be "as the days of heaven upon earth," when she shall be freed from the king of curses.

Let the battle against alcohol go on all over the nation. Let Christians and patriots everywhere stand against this legalized enemy of all good, and see that it shall be legal no longer. The victory will not be an easy one, but it will be glorious when achieved. I hope your correspondent from Natchez will yet be a member of that Legislature which shall show to the people of his native State that "prohibition can prohibit," by framing such a law as shall effectually prevent wholesale killing by spirituous liquors. Yes, it can be done, it ought to be done, it will be done. If we will not do it, the survivors of our destruction will. This Protean ox has been goring long enough. He has slain by thousands, and is slaying still. Let him be butchered for the good of mankind and the honor of God. And let all the people say: Amen!

The New South.

Among the many things we have heard and seen on this subject is a sermon by Dr. Haygood, delivered to the students of Emory College, and the citizens of Oxford, Ga., November 25, 1880. It is in pamphlet form, and is entitled "The New South, Gratitude, Amendment, Hope. A Thanksgiving Sermon." This document has been sent to all parts of Alabama, and, from newspaper notices, it seems into other States also. The preacher says he has thought a great deal about what he declares—that these things "are on his conscience," and "he has spoken what he solemnly believes to be the truth." The president of Emory College knows how to use words, and can say just what he wants to say; his meaning is too plain to be misunderstood. Fully persuaded that this sermon will be profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness to the Southern people, whom he characterizes, in whole or in part, in one place of the sermon or another, directly or indirectly, as croaking, blundering, illiterate lazy, prodigal, provincial, intolerant lawless, he has been forced, by the conscientiousness which first prompted him to preach it, to print it, and send it at his own expense to us, who sit in the regions of darkness and the habitations of cruelty.

I do not like it as a sermon. Its whole make-up and smack are characteristic rather of a political speech, made by a dignified, respectful orator, than of a gospel sermon, preached in the pulpit of an evangelical church. The main facts are mostly and manifestly political, and so is their collation. Undeniably, the Holy Spirit gives great liberty in the selection of themes and their modes of treatment, and many good and great preachers have availed themselves of this liberty. But woe to the church when the utterances of the pulpit can be distinguished from those of the platform only by the place of delivery and the title of the speaker. This discourse would have been far more appropriately delivered had it come from the chair of the class-room, the rostrum of the chapel, or even from the stand of a political club-room.

We mean to do Dr. Haygood no wrong. The discourse contains some excellent things, and our desire is to give him full credit for all the good [illegible] every bit of it.

The first division states the grounds of the citizen's obligation to obey the laws of the land. This is done in his very best, clearest style, and his reasoning is fully established by strong, clear, pointed quotations from the Bible. But in enumerating "our faults and lacks," on page 13, he says respect for law "is not a characteristic quality of our people. The educating influences of many generations have been unfavorable to the development of this sentiment as a mental habit, or rather as a mental characteristic." It is evident he is speaking here of the South as compared with other sections of the "nation." The comparison is not formally introduced here, but runs through the whole sermon, and comes distinctly to the surface on page 14, when, in speaking of our educational facilities, he says "we are one hundred years behind the Eastern and Middle States, and many of the new States of the West." There is no better way to determine the lawlessness of a people than first to know their criminal code, and, secondly, to know whether the courts enforce it against offenders. Now, without pretending to be a lawyer at all, I do insist that the criminal code of the South is as ample and as minute, and that its enforcement is as uniform as in any other part of the "nation," and that the statistics of crime will show that though we are sinners, and should repent, yet that we are not sinners above all who dwell in America, as the doctor would make us believe. It is strange that he should have echoed the old cry of lawlessness against the South, as in the words quoted above from page 14, when on pages 9 and 10 he had used the following, which I italicise that they may be well considered: "Why has not this whole Southern country repeated the scenes of Hayti and San Domingo? Not the repressive power of a strong government, not the fear of the stronger race, not that suggestions have been lacking from fierce and narrow fanatics, but chiefly in this, the conservative power of the Protestant religion, which had taken such root in the hearts and lives of our people. The controling sentiment of the Southern people, in city and hamlet, in camp and field, among white and black, has been religion."

Putting the two quotations together reminds one of the kiss and the dagger.

The truth is there were three things always working to cultivate respect for law in the Southern mind. The Protestant religion, the institution of slavery, and the assaults of other sections upon rights guaranteed by the constitution, and the history of the country, proves that the South has been as peaceable as any other portion of it from the very first.

After stating the grounds of gratitude, he comes, on page 6, to the special reasons why all the people should praise God. He mentions five of these. 1. Christian religion; good. 2. Peace at home and abroad; good. 3. That when Gen. Garfield should take the Presidential seat it would not shake and strain the political fabric as it did for Mr. Hayes to sit down in that chair; good again. 5. Business prosperity; good again. But fourthly is not so good: "That we have had so clean and able an administration during the last four years."

The doctor cannot mean by "clean and able administration" the action of the Senate and House of Representatives, for they were both Democratic, and the majority of that party was made up of Southern leaders, whom the doctor says, on page 10, "have manifested, during these years of political conflict, 'an unmeasurable capacity for blundering.'" Of course then he must mean the President. But surely he has forgotten that this administration gave the greatest possible encouragement to the abomination of ballot-stuffing, by rewarding with offices and employment of the government every man and woman, high and low, who was known to have taken part in certain things of that sort done in Louisiana and Florida about four years ago. If rewarding villainy for villainy's sake is "clean," then that is clean, but, in the name of the new South and the old, we protest against such stuff being taught from the pulpit to the educated or uneducated young men of this land.

Next are given four reasons "why we of the South should thank God and take courage." In introducing these he goes back to 1860, and draws a line, on this side of which is "our present system," and on the other side "the old system." In 1865 the old South died, and the new South was born. First, "Our industrial and financial condition is marvellously good." The proof is that six million bales of cotton are now made, instead of three or four millions. More sewing machines, cook stoves, pianos, organs, pictures, [illegible] mattresses, and fewer tallow dips, prettier houses and churches, better support for colleges and preachers, etc., all of which facts are true, and for all of which we do feel grateful. But the idea is meant to be conveyed that if the "old system" had continued these things would not have been, and that they are the special results of "our present system." This we believe is not so. The increased cotton crop is to be explained by two facts, which could have existed under the old system as easily as under the new. First, in the old cotton belt nearly all the labor now goes to make cotton alone. Hardly anything else is grown. Second, the use of commercial fertilizers has extended cotton culture much further north, which has increased the acreage, and employed more than twice the former number of hands. Then the fresh land of Texas. The more elegant and sweeter home life has come in part from the lower prices of the articles mentioned and in part from the cultivated esthetic tastes of the hundreds of men and women educated in our colleges and schools during ante-bellum years, under the regime and spirit of the "old system." And, had the old system continued to live, we would have seen more of these things than we now see. The second reason is that peace has prevailed, and now prevails, and which he very candidly and justly attributes to the religious and law-abiding spirit of the people, black and white, in city and hamlet, as quoted above.

The third is the restoration of the States of the South to their constitutional relations to the Federal government. He thinks we should be peculiarly grateful that this has been done in such a "short space," and in spite of "the immeasurable capacity for blundering which the leaders of the dominant party in our section have manifested during these years of political strife." That smells so rank of stalwartism that I will not trust myself to comment on it, and will dismiss it by referring the doctor and all his readers to a speech delivered by Gen. Morgan, in the United States Senate, January 11, 1881.

The fourth reason is the abolition of slavery. On this point he speaks clearly and sensibly, and reflects the feelings and views of I reckon ninety-nine per cent. of the former slave owners. He also does justice to the "peculiar institution," and to the good men who labored to Christianize the black man in his bondage and barbarism. In the next division he takes up "our faults and lacks," which he says "to reform and improve is a hard task," because through "ignorance" "the necessities of party politics," "sinful hatred" and "habit," "we are the subjects of denunciation and misrepresentation by critics of the Northern States, and of other countries." He hit the nail on the head that time plumb.

There are five of these: provincialism, illiteracy, want of literature, of educational facilities and of factories, to which afterwards he adds sparseness of population, all of which, he says, "are explained by one fact and one word—slavery." The doctor says he has "got new light." Let us see if it does not strike his eye through smoked glass.

The remarks under provincialism take from the word its usual meaning, and make it mean ignorance of the outside world. Now it is easy to see how slavery could make the outside world ignorant of us, but it is utterly impossible to see how it could make us ignorant of that. As to illiteracy among the whites, absence of literature and of educational facilities, it looks like the blindness of prejudice for any man to attribute these to slavery. If this was the cause, why are we still just about where we were when slavery was abolished? What has "our present system" done to improve these matters? Why, well nigh nothing. The friends of Methodism in the single county of Macon, Ala., did almost, if not fully, as much for education the last ten years before the war as the whole Methodist Church, South, has done since, and one moment's thought will convince any man, who has not got the doctor's new light, that if the old South had not died, in 1865, every college in the new South would to-day be amply endowed and full of students, excepting, of course, those built for the colored people since the war by the benevolence of the North. As to literature the South is too young and too poor to furnish the conditions prerequisite. Only forty-five years ago nearly half of Alabama was occupied by hostile Indians, which is also the fact with reference to nearly half of the whole South. This hackneyed derision of

...e South is as insane and unjust as ...e same derision of Methodism. ...oth have had as yet to look after ...ier matters prior in the nature of ...ings to high literature, more im...ortant, more vital than the writing ...ks. —A telegram from Shreveport announces that Mrs. C. K. Parsons died in that city, March 29. Mrs. Parsons had reached the unusual age of eighty-nine years. She was a woman of great dignity and force of character, remarkably well informed, and a most devoted and consistent Christian. In early womanhood she was converted under a sermon preached by Rev. J. C. Burruss. Mrs. Parson was a member of the Presbyterian Church. For many years she had lived with her daughter Mrs. Hackett, and it was in this home, where her declining years were cheered by the tenderest affection, that the aged saint closed her weary eyes upon the things which are seen. Universally revered and loved, her death will be deeply regretted by a large circle of kindred and friends. For years she had, in age and feebleness, been waiting and expecting the Master's call, and we doubt not the hour of her release came to her finding her ready, and even joyously ready for the change. A noble character and life were hers, and the end must have been peace.

—"Is it prudent for a traveling minister to spend much of his time in town in the stores playing chess?" A singular question, to be sure; but some one asks it. In reply we should say that it is not possible for him to do so without neglecting his studies, his pastoral duties, and greatly injuring his usefulness. We do not regard chess as wrong in itself, nor would we condemn it as resorted to for occasional recreation. But to spend much time in this way is what no one can afford, much less a minister of the gospel who has solemnly promised to devote himself wholly to God and his work, and "never to trifle away time" nor "to spend any more time at any place than is strictly necessary."

—Rev. A. J. Witherspoon informs us that Hon. E. John Ellis will deliver an address at the Upper Bethel, in this city, on Monday, April 11, at eight P. M., for the benefit of the Sailor's Home, which has just been undertaken. Admission, twenty-five cents. Mr. Ellis is an attractive speaker—the object is one that commends itself to all benevolent people.

—Rev. A. B. Nicholson, of the Spring Ridge circuit, Mississippi Conference, gave us a call on his way through the city last week.

—The Prohibitionist is the title of a new monthly published at Columbus, Miss. Rev. S. A. Steel, of Columbus, Miss., and Rev. C. B. Galloway, of Vicksburg, are the editors. The paper is devoted to the advocacy of temperance and the prohibition of the whole liquor business. We wish the paper and the cause success. The editors are forcible and accomplished writers, and will make a good paper. The subscription price is 50 cents a year.

The following notice, addressed to the friends of temperance and prohibition, by the editors of the Prohibitionist, we take pleasure in commending to the attention of our Mississippi readers:

We believe a convention of temperance friends and workers should be held. Organization is necessary to our success. Singly we may do much, but in union there is strength. The whisky power can command large means and will be hard to overthrow. But it can be done. There is enough of virtue and courageous moral purposes in Mississippi to drive it from our borders, if utilized and organized. Not wishing to assume the responsibility of calling such a convention, we ask all favorable to it to communicate at once by postal with either of the editors. We hope to hear from every section of the State. Our brethren of the press will confer a great favor by republishing this card.

Rev. J. D. Parker, of this city, writing March 31, says: "I have just received a letter from my son, Rev. R. H. Parker, Bristol Station, Holston Conference, Tennessee, in which he says: 'For six weeks I have been almost constantly engaged in a revival. I suppose Bristol never enjoyed such an extensive work of grace, as that we have passed through. It commenced in our church, and as it advanced nearly all the pastors of the place came to the rescue, and helped. We worked together most harmoniously through it all, and it was most delightful. The result we estimate in the neighborhood of one hundred conversions. We have had thus far forty-one accessions to our church, and many backsliders reclaimed, and the church at large greatly revived. I do thank God most heartily for such a token of his love; we needed it so much."

Rev. W. H. Leith writing from Hazlehurst, Miss., April 2, says: This will bear to you the sad intelligence of the death of Sister Pearson, wife of Rev. B. T. Pearson, of the Mississippi Conference. She died, at Crystal Springs, Miss., on Tuesday of this week, at 6 o'clock P. M., and was buried on Thursday afternoon, her funeral being attended by a large number of relatives and friends. Appropriate services were conducted by her pastor, Rev. B. Carradine, and other six ministers acted as pall-bearers. Her husband and three little children need, and I ask for them, the sympathies and prayers of the church. A suitable obituary will be furnished by Bro. Carradine.

A Working Society.

MR. EDITOR: You will be glad to know that we have in our church a "Woman's Missionary Society," organized last June. We have sent to the treasurer of the Mississippi Conference Woman's Missionary Society $38 50.

God has graciously blessed this missionary effort of Southern Methodist women. May their interest in the good work widen and deepen, until every one in the entire church shall have caught the true missionary spirit, and of each it may be said: "She hath done what she could."

Respectfully,

MRS. C. D. ANDREWS.

JACKSON, La., April 2, 1881.

Moody and Sankey have held their farewell service in San Francisco. Referring to their work there, the Pacific Methodist says:

"As to the full and final results of this long campaign it is too early to speak. There have been added to the various Protestant Churches in San Francisco and Oakland between one and two thousand converts. Perhaps as many more will be added within a few weeks. The membership of some of the feebler churches will be doubled, and that of some of the stronger ones, will be increased from 25 to 50 per cent. But it is claimed by those most familiar with the work, that even these figures, large as they are, represent only a small part of the good accomplished. Many have been reformed who have not and will not join the churches. And hundreds of church members who had become careless and inefficient have been aroused to new energy and fidelity. In this way the strength of what is called the evangelical element in the city may be said to have been doubled; for one man who is wide awake is worth more than two who are half asleep.

There are two facts in regard to this long campaign worthy of special mention: First—The interest has not at any time flagged. The crowds who pressed to hear Mr. Moody were as great, if not greater, on the last week than on the first. Second—There has been no collection taken at any meeting. The word money has not been uttered from first to last. It has been literally a Gospel "without money and without price." This visit of the evangelists to the Pacific Coast has been a success. It has not revolutionized society, abolished vice and crime, and brought in the millenium; but it has toned up the church, and much good seed has been sown, that will bring forth thirty, sixty, and one hundred fold.

The Madison Journal, published at Delta, Louisiana, says:

Last Sunday night, Rev. J. W. Harmon organized the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at this place. The Doctor preached an eloquent, most convincing and touching discourse, from the text, "He, being dead, yet speaketh." His subject was individual character and individual action for good or evil, and he handled it with an earnestness bordering on conviction to the minds of all who heard him. After the conclusion of the services, several joined themselves to the good cause, and more have been added since, until there are now some eleven members. This makes the second Protestant church organized in the parish since the Doctor's pastorage—he having organized the one at Tallulah on the 13th inst.

Rev. A. J. Foster, preacher in charge of Austin station, North Mississippi Conference, writing March 28, says: "Our first Quarterly Conference is just over. Bro. Barton, the presiding elder, was with us. We had a good time. Congregations good; a good Sunday-school; prayer meeting well attended. We are praying for a revival of religion, and do not expect to be disappointed. It is needed here. The people are very kind to me. I am in good spirits."

We deeply regret to learn that Rev. W. D. Stayton, of the Louisiana Conference, is seriously ill. Rev. J. W. Hearn, writing from Atlanta, Ga., March 28, says: "Brother Stayton's health is yet very bad, on account of which he has not been able to go to his work, and perhaps never will. He has consumption. Let the whole church pray for him and his distressed family."

The Huntsville Gazette, of April 2 says of the recent revival in our church in Huntsville Ala.

The remarkable three week's revival at the Methodist Episcopal Church was closed last Friday night. The results are undoubtedly very encouraging to the church. About seventy new members have been added to its rolls, while the number of converts did not fall much short of a hundred.

Preparations are already being made for the International Sunday-school Convention, which meets in Toronto, June 22. The general subject to be discussed will be, "The New Century in Sunday-school Work," the motto being, "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before." The programme provides for the discussion of many branches of the Sunday-school work. The reports from the several States, Territories, and provinces are to be compressed into three minutes each.

Mrs. A. L. P. Green, widow of the late Rev. Dr. A. L. P. Green, died, says the Nashville Christian Advocate, at the residence of Col. Thomas D. Fite, of Nashville, on Sunday, March 20. Of all the holy and beloved Christian women who blessed the church while they lived, and were long and tenderly mourned when dead, none was saintlier or sweeter in character than Mrs. Green.

The London Christian World states that the Rev. Dr. John Cumming, once the most popular preacher in that city, though in good physical health, is in such a mental condition as to be practically dead to the world.

Dr. Theodore Christlieb, the celebrated preacher and professor of theology at Bonn, Germany, has been engaged to give a course of lecture on preaching before the students of Yale Theological School in 1882.

The Rev. John M. Steel, of the White River Conference, died in peace, after long illness, at his residence in Harrisburg, Ark., March 22.

Seashore Camp Ground.

MR. EDITOR: On Thursday, March 24, the Board of Trustees held a meeting upon the camp ground, to look after its interests, and make early arrangements for the camp meeting of 1881. They found the grounds in good order, and improvements going forward. The severe storm of February, which swept entirely away the bath-houses and piers, did no harm to the grounds further than the destruction of a few decayed trees.

The bath-houses and piers were ordered rebuilt, and a new restaurant or dining hall to take the place of the old, which, as a temporary structure, has done good service for years.

The tenters and visitors of the camp ground will be pleased to learn that action was had to secure the erection of an improved station house, and to obtain the establishment of a postoffice and telegraph office upon the grounds, for the greater convenience and accommodation of the thousands attending the camp meeting, and visiting and residing on the grounds during the summer season.

The trustees have adopted a rule fixing the extent of the season for occupying the tents upon the camp ground, to wit: from the first of May to the first of November, and no tent can be occupied earlier nor later than these dates without the consent of the trustees. This rule is adopted in the interest of the grounds, and with reference to the risks from fire, and is of great importance to every person owning or occupying a tent upon the grounds. Tenters will please take note of this rule.

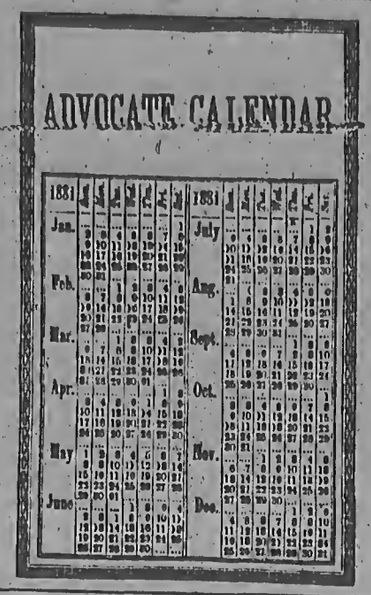
MARION; or, Sofe in the Shadow of the Rock. By Margaret E. Winslow. Philadelphia: American Sunday-school Union.

The author says: "this little book has been written solely to illustrate the way in which a child may come to Christ." This is certainly a noble purpose, and worthy of the best powers of the most gifted pen. It is said to be an excellent work and calculated to do much good.



—From the Southern Methodist Publishing House, we have received a copy of "Mary Singleton; or, the Question Answered." This little volume by Rev. James D. Cameron, has been noticed by us some time ago. In the form of a very attractive story, the author exhibits the evils of the modern dance, and indicates the path of Christian duty, and faithfulness in regard to it. Our Sunday-school Editor, Dr. Cunnyngham, has placed this excellent work in our Sunday-school catalogue. It can be ordered of Lathrop & Wilkins, 142 Camp street, New Orleans.

—Ina's Visit to Virginia, is another little volume just from the press of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, it is by Sara, Kealhofer Hunt. It is a book for children, and is well adapted to interest and benefit them. It is edited and very highly commended by Dr. Cunnyngham. We have not read it, but it is sufficiently endorsed. Price fifty cents. For sale by Lathrop & Wilkins, New Orleans.

—A paper by R. W. Emerson, on his personal impressions of Thomas Carlyle, made up from his unpublished letters written at the time of his first visit to England, will appear in Scribner for May. The publication is made by special arrangement with Mr. Emerson and the Massachusetts Historical Society, before which the paper was read, and in the minutes of which it is to be printed after its appearance in Scribner.

—The Southern Youth, is the title of a new paper to be published, by Rev. R. G. Porter and Rev. J. W. Boswell, at Verona, Mississippi and Morrilton, Ark. It is to be devoted to the moral and moral development of the boys and girls of the South. The prospectus informs us that it will be an eight page monthly, price sixty cents a year.

—St. Nicholas for April, is as sprightly and attractive as ever. Among the articles are: Lost in the Fog; The Smallest Bird in the World; Master Moono; Foxy Confucius; The Little Woolly Elephants; The Copper and the Wolves; Mary, Queen of Scott's; In Natures Wonderland; The Peterkins Excursion for Maple Sugar; The Treasure box of English Literature.

ODE TO SPRING.

Diphtherial wildness, thou hast come,
The frost has gone away;
The school ma'am's arctic overshoes
Are on the shelf to stay.

The blue-bird pipes, the robin sings,
And hitching posts feel gay;
The merry clam he climbs the hills
And bids the lark good day.

The grass am green, the dandelion
Begins to show his head;
The cowslip slips it's way along
Toward the lily's bed.

Rejoice, rejoice, thou spring am here,
An' fishin time's close by;
Git off your woolen undershirts
An' bid fur cape good-by.

The Fakir of Siva gave a sleight-of-hand performance in Galveston. One of his feats was to make a marked dollar disappear in the sight of the crowd, which he successfully did. "That marked dollar will be found in the vest-pocket of that colored gentleman," said the Fakir, pointing with his magic wand at Sam Johnson. All eyes were riveted on Sam, who advanced to the front, took some money from his vest-pocket, and said "Boss, here is your change. I has had two beers and a cigar outen dat dollar you told me to keep in my vest-pocket till you called fomh it."

The Christian at Work says: It was at a funeral that the officiating minister, a Presbyterian brother, said, "Let us conclude these services by singing the long metre doxology, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'" This One it was a Methodist brother who arose at a weekly meeting and said, "Brethren, when I consider the shortness of life, I feel as if I might be taken away suddenly, like a thief in the night." All this happened in one week in the State of New Jersey.

The ladies have taken so much to wearing the costumes of men that it is difficult to tell which is which, especially when the hair is cropped short in front. A cabman who had driven his passenger to the proper place, respectfully said, "Thank you, sir!" as his fare was handed him by a fair lady in a Derby hat and a long brown ulster.

A German shoemaker having made a pair of boots for a gentleman of whose financial integrity he had considerable doubt, made the following reply to him when he called for the articles: "Der poots ish not quite done, but der leet is made out."

"Can I give my son a college education at home?" says a proud and anxious father. "Certainly," replies an expert who knows all about it. "All you want is a baseball guide, a racing shell, and a few packages of cigarettes."

The train had just rolled into the station, and little Charley stood listening a moment to the sound of escaping steam. Then, turning to his father, he said, "Pa, the engine's all out o' breath, ain't it?"

"Yes, I want my daughter to study rhetoric," said a Vermont mother, "for she can't fry pancakes now without smoking the house all up."

WORK FOR THE MONTH.

The vegetable garden is now in its exuberance of growth; cultivate well, and hoe out the weeds. Thin out all young crops, to prevent crowding. Water when [illegible] cauliflower requires copious watering at the roots when growing heads. Celery seed beds and plants are also in need of waters; if however, labor and care are deficient, these vegetables will not make a return for planting; as soil can never be too rich for them. When beets are too thick, they can be transplanted; cut off the large thick leaves, lift carefully, and dibble them into rows, or amongst other crops that are too thin; do this in moist weather.

Do not overlook planting a few beets, peas, corn, cucumbers, lettuce, leeks, melons, summer radishes; and, in fact, all varieties named for last month's sowing can be still put in, which will afford an ample succession of crops.

If melons or any crops have not come up well, stir the ground and replant at once; whenever you have bad, poor supply of seeds, make a note of failures, and procure the parties with it; such action will benefit yourself and others. See to trying up endive for blanching before use; at this season it will blanch in eight or ten days.

About the last of the month sow a supply of improved flat dutch, drumhead, and drumhead savoy cabbage for June planting, to head in fall; these varieties will always produce fine heads in the South. At this season of the year the small fabinge-fly is very destructive to the young plants, and frequently destroys them as fast as they make their appearance above ground; always keep them well dusted with plaster, or apply strong tobacco water until they are sufficiently large to withstand such attacks.

Spring-sown cabbage is now ready for transplanting; the soil for their culture must be rich to insure fine heads. Sow celery for main crop, hill up potatoes and keep them well cultivated. Train the limas to poles and stake all peas planted last month. Do not neglect your asparagus bed; keep it well cultivated and hoe[illegible] with a hoe until the shoots commence appearing.

FLAX.—Sow as soon as the ground is dry, mellow and warm, and danger from heavy frosts is over, the dew leaving will the month from the 1st of March to the 1st of May. If sown early the weeds and grass are likely to [illegible] some, the crop to be small and hard frosts to be harmful; but early sowing is necessary to obtain a fine quality of fiber, as the crop grows spindling and dry. With reference to the quantity of seed to sow it will depend much upon the time to sow it, whether early or late; the latter sowing requires more seed than the former. Two bushels per acre is the usual quantity sown broadcast, but if sown in drills one bushel will be sufficient. Flax requires a rich, deep, mellow soil, and the ground must be thoroughly prepared before sowing the seed. Harrow in the seed and roll the ground after sowing. Flax should be pulled when the seed is ripe, and the stalks are turning yellow. Flax is a very exhausting crop to the soil, and should not be grown on the same piece of ground more than once in four years. Eggs are [illegible] and the expenses [illegible] not much. My chickens [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Mississippi, in which they have passed [illegible] and keeping them warm and dry. Fowls [illegible] boxes each, with a window, through which to [illegible] wheat. I find wetting [illegible] mixing with [illegible] which assists to answer the purpose, and of which they are very fond.—New York Observer.

THE EGG QUESTION.—The thinning of [illegible] eggs [illegible] this season should have [illegible] as [illegible] a single week's [illegible] diminished, attend to it immediately. It is a saving of food. Begin the hens and set pots for grapes, [illegible] before the busy days [illegible]. Planting should be [illegible] as early as the soil is in good working order, that the plants may get well established before the hot weather comes. Make the main cutting of well established [illegible] as many of the new sorts as can be obtained. Black berries [illegible] very early, and when possible they should be set in the fall, but it is to be played [illegible] as soon as may be. No fruit is to be expected the first year, the best return for currants is an open bush with several stems. The [illegible] should be [illegible]. No one should be without strawberries. As to the best variety for the table [illegible] Charles Downing [illegible] not excelled. The Wilson is the [illegible] for market. For [illegible] Sir Harry Bayham and Green Prolific. Triumph de Gand and Lucinda are best for heavy soils. If set this spring a good crop may be expected next spring; the plants [illegible] one season's growth after transplanting.—American Agriculturist.

CALIFORNIA RAISINS.—Raisins are being produced to quite an extent in California. In Yolo county a gentleman by the name of Blowers is said to prepare them in large quantities. His method is as follows:

The grapes are picked after they have become of a golden color, and are transparent. They are then put on wooden trays, two by three feet in size, and the trays placed sloping toward the sun, between the [illegible] and they are turned by putting a tray on top, and inverting them both, they are thus transferred to the new tray. When the grapes lose their ashy appearance the green ones are removed and the rest put into boxes to sweat. Sheets of paper are put between every twenty-five pounds of raisins, and they are left in the sweating boxes for two weeks, when the stems become tough and the raisins soft. They are then assorted, weighed, boxed and sent to market. The California raisins are thought to be of a superior quality, and are very much sought after.

IS HORSE SHOEING USELESS? A recent issue of Fraser's Magazine contains an article by Sir George W. Cox, in which he estimates that the English custom of horse-shoeing costs the nation annually as much as $15,000,000, which might be saved if the horses were allowed to go unshod. He quotes authorities from Xenophon, who marched his horses unshod from Cunaxa over the Armenian Highlands to the walls of Trebizond, down to the "free lancers" of the present day, and contends that it is safer, cheaper, and better to let horses go unshod over the hardest roads, and especially in the slippery streets of London. He estimates that over twelve million dollars would be saved in farriers' bills alone; and he calculates further, that the working life of a horse would be trebled by the change, so that a horse which is now worn out at twelve years would live to twenty-six.

The figures seem somewhat startling and have hardly been sufficiently proved to be trustworthy. Meanwhile, it is said that a medical man in Waterbury, Conn., has not put shoes on his horses for two years, driving them winter, summer, spring and autumn, with hard roads without any trouble. The doctor's theory is that nature has provided for the horse; that a horse can travel over all kinds of roads; that the hoof will do the most, and that the frog coming to the ground keeps the hoof properly spread, and free from foul and other diseases.

GRUBBY WORMS.—A writer in the Rural Record says there is no necessity of shedding currant worms; this is done by having bushes interplanted, the worms always attacking the new growth first. He says: "My plan is this: In starting a currant patch I cause the bush not to exceed from one to three main stems, and give it all the length of the root to their support. As hinted above, sprouts will start from the roots each spring; but they must be rooted out when six inches long. All currant growers are aware that worms first make their appearance on the new growth and then spread over the bush. Consequently, no sprouts, no worms. This is just as plain as that wood and hoe work. I have followed this plan for the past two years to my satisfaction and have barely seen the effects of worms on one or two bushes where my plan was not fully carried out. But such currants I never saw grow. The common red Dutch being nearly as large as the cherry currant and a better bearer. I had a few bushes that accidentally broke down from their load of fruit.

FARM SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.—France has agricultural schools for girls. One of the chief is near Rouen, which is said to have begun with a capital of one franc, by a sister of charity and two little discharged convict girls, and to be now worth $50,000. The establishment has now three hundred girls from six to eighteen. The farm, entirely cultivated by them, is over four hundred acres in extent. Twenty-five sisters form the staff of teachers. More than one medal of the French Agricultural Society has been awarded to this establishment at Dorneval, and the pupils are in great demand all over Normandy on account of their skill. They go out as stewards, gardeners, farm managers, dairy women and dairymaids. Each girl leaving an outfit and a small sum of money, earned in spare hours. If they wish to come they can always return to Dorneval, which they are taught to regard as their home.

FROZEN POTATOES.—An English gentleman on this subject writes: "We know of no plan equal to burying them in the ground. Dig a trench, spread the potatoes as thinly as possible, and cover them with the soil, which should be dry with the tubers. If this does not cover the frost and leave the tubers sound, nothing will that we are acquainted with. Potatoes thus protected in the ground all the winter are usually sound in the spring, though in an occasional forcing season the surface rots almost before the frost has left them. We have often observed that potatoes have partly emitted their sprouts in the soil frozen above where exposed and sound below where embedded. Yet the frost must have penetrated the soil below the potato."

PENCILS.—Fences, says an intelligent writer, are proudly a greater favorite with farmers than is generally supposed. If a farm of one hundred and sixty acres is only fenced so as to make fields of twenty acres each, it contains about five miles of fence; and if the fence rows [illegible] with [illegible] of wood, or six cords per [illegible] the whole farm is occupied by fences. Those fence rows generally form the nursery for weeds, which is amply sufficient to stock the whole farm with that commodity.

PEACH CULTIVATION.—Indian orchards have raised the largest crops in the world. The native is Lady Peach, a breed, mixed Durham and Big English. Her most [illegible] are: Greatest height, five feet ten inches; girth, eight feet nine inches; length, between six inches; or including tail, seven feet six. Her form is good; and, though not fat, she weighs three thousand pounds. Her color is [illegible] white, [illegible] predominating. Age, six years. Her present owner lives in Stark county, Illinois.

All soils are improved by mixing. The desired properties of the soil have an important influence upon its average fertility. The admixture of pure sand with clay soil produces an alteration which is often beneficial, and which is almost wholly mechanical. The sand opens the pores of the clay and makes it more permeable to the air.

If you have no vine in your garden the spring is the time to plant one. A vine with roots one or two years old is better than an older one. Make a large hole for the roots and spread them evenly. When the buds start and the shoots have grown an inch or two, rub off all but the strongest ones.

Household.

HOW A FAMOUS CHEESE IS MADE.—Perhaps the most justly celebrated cheese made on the Continent of Europe is the Swiss Gruyere. This is made mostly in huts called chalets, high up among the Alps, at the time [illegible] when the [illegible] sides are accessible, and the huts habitable, say from the melting of the snow in May to the end of September, when men and animals descend for the winter into the sheltered valleys thousands of feet below. The chalets are located in the midst of the mountain pastures on a spot safe from avalanches, and generally near to a small pond or spring of water, when such are available. Provisions from the valleys are carried up weekly to the chalets, and it is under such difficult and romantic circumstances that a cheese is made which, for hundreds of years has been considered almost, if not quite, the best on the Continent.

The milk, partly skimmed, or pot, according to the quality of cheese desired, to be made, is put into a great kettle and swung on a crane over a gentle fire, where it is allowed to attain a temperature of seventy-seven degrees Fahrenheit, when the kettle is swung off the fire and rennet is added to the milk. When coagulation has advanced far enough the curd is cut into as fine pieces as is practicable with the large wooden knife which is used for the purpose. The kettle is then swung over the fire again, and the curd is taken up in small quantities in a porringer, and poured back through the fingers, whereby it is still more finely divided. Great importance is attached to this division of the curd, in order that each particle may be fully exposed to the action of the heat in the "cooking" process, which ensues up to a point when a temperature of ninety degrees has been attained. The kettle is then immediately swung off the fire, and the waste of curd and whey stirred for some fifteen minutes longer; and if the cooking has been properly performed, the particles of curd have the appearance of bursted grains of rice swimming in the whey. The curd is then collected in a cloth, and great care is taken to expel all the whey. The salting of the cheese is also considered a delicate and important process. The salt is rubbed from time to time on the outside of the cheese, care being taken to discern when enough shall have been absorbed. The Gruyere cheeses are commonly three feet in diameter, and weigh over one hundred pounds. A successful cheese of this kind is like a soft yellow paste, which melts in the mouth, and is filled with cavities about the size of a pea, one or two, say, in each square inch of cheese.—Harper's Journal.

CHOCOLATE PUDDING.—One quart milk, fourteen level tablespoonfuls of grated bread-crumbs, twelve table spoonfuls grated chocolate, six eggs, one teaspoonful of vanilla, sugar to make very sweet; separate the yolks and whites of four eggs, beat up the four yolks and two whole eggs together very light, with the sugar; put the milk on the range, and when it comes to a perfect boil pour it over the bread and chocolate; add the beaten eggs and sugar and vanilla, taste it to be sure it is sweet enough, pour into a buttered dish, bake one hour in a moderate oven; when cold, and just before it is served, have the four whites beaten with a little powdered sugar and flavored with vanilla, and use as a meringue.

ROAST CHICKENS.—Procure, if possible, chickens with a white breast bone; truss them neatly, and let them be carefully singed; put an onion and a piece of salt, butter equal to it in bulk inside each chicken; tie a piece of buttered paper or a slice of bacon over the breast and roast at a moderate fire, basting frequently with the butter. Time of roasting about half an hour. About ten minutes before they are done remove the paper or bacon and sprinkle them freely with salt. Serve with plain gravy in a boat, not in the dish; garnish with thin slices of broiled bacon, rolled up.

TEA CAKES.—Mix two teaspoonfuls of baking powder with a pound of flour and two ounces of powdered loaf sugar. Rub in two ounces of butter, and when ready to bake, make into a dough with a gill and a half of skim milk, and one egg beaten up in it. Have ready three pound cake tins, brush over with butter, half fill each with the cake, and put into a quick oven the moment after mixing. Bake half an hour.

Before the children's stockings begin to be thin at the knees, and to need darning, put a piece of cloth under and sew with fine stitches so that they will not show; soft flannel or pieces of old stockings which are strong enough to be worth using are better than any heavier cloth. By taking the trouble to do this, stockings may be made to last twice as long as without it.

TO SERVE COLD ROAST MUTTON.—Too much must not be cut off from the joint or it will not answer. Bone it, cut the meat as flat, by inches, as it must be, and lay meat slices thin with the suet over it. Add water to cover it, and all sorts of kinds of vegetables, onions, turnips, carrots, parsley, etc., in small quantities; stew two hours, thicken the gravy and serve the fillets with the vegetables around it.

FRENCH CAKES.—Excellent baker cakes can be cheaply made into a pan kept for the purpose, every scrap of bread, cake or pudding left from the table, and adding a few spoonfuls of milk now and then. The mass should ferment and be tossed time, and flour, water, milk and soda added. As safe from being good eating, they are to be turned for those who have no hogs to eat such scraps.

LEMON SYRUP.—Take eight good-sized lemons or half cream of tartar, the solid portion, cut them up, and put them to boil with two quarts of soft stock and a teacup of herbs. When well cooked, thicken with a little flour, smoothed and dissolved in a little cold water. Then strain all through a sieve, repeat a little, and add butter, salt and pepper to taste.

It is a good plan to put new earthenware into cold water and let it heat gradually until it boils; then cool again. Brown earthenware in particular may be toughened in this way. A handful of rye or wheat bran thrown in while it is boiling will preserve the glazing so that it will not be destroyed by acid or salt.

JOHNNY CAKE.—One pint of boiled rice or hominy, one egg, one tablespoonful of butter, salt to taste, flour enough to make a soft dough; roll half an inch thick; bake quick, without blistering, serve hot; tear the cakes open and butter; cut the cakes four inches long and three wide.

COTTAGE PUDDING.—Take two cupfuls of flour, one of sugar and one of milk, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, one egg. Beat together, and add one teaspoonful of soda. Bake half an hour; serve with sauce to taste.

Scientific.

—The Tiberine Museum at Rome, which has been lately opened to the public, contains the objects of ancient Roman art that have been recovered in the excavations for enlarging the bed of the Tiber, which have been [illegible] many of them rare and beautiful. He, says a correspondent of the Evening Post, like fossils in the rock, and represent every age from Leo XIII. back to the earliest times. Among the most interesting of them are a set of ancient frescoes from the wall of a Roman house of about the age of Augustus, which are pronounced by competent judges to be the most beautiful relics of ancient painting that remain to us. Some of them have lost all but the faint outlines of their original forms by the influence of moisture; others retain marvelous brilliancy of their red, black and yellow grounds, and the graceful figures, the columns, the flowers, and the twining tendrils are as enchanting as if finished but yesterday." A series of designs in stucco, much damaged, are very beautiful in their mutilated condition, and are supposed by some to represent a polyanthus, by others the history of Osiris. A rich tomb, nearly twenty-five feet square, contained a life size statute of a Roman matron, the portrait bust of a younger woman, and eight funeral urns, two of which were in the form of temples ornamented with dolphins, two were plain round vases, and four were richly decorated with garlands, flowers, fruits, acanthus leaves, and bulls' heads. Three of the urns contained burnt bones and ashes.

—Before the voyage of the Challenger, hardly thirty species of deep sea fish were known. The list has now been increased to more than one hundred species, yet no new types of families have been discovered. Some novel and very interesting modifications of certain organs have been met with, but nothing more than what might have been expected from our previous knowledge of the group. The greatest depth at which fish were inclosed is 2,900 fathoms; but the species brought up is one that is very abundant in the upper strata of water, and the examples were probably caught on the way up. A fish drawn up when the dredge reached the depth of 2,750 fathoms showed by its whole habit that it was a being living on the bottom of the ocean, and justifies the assumption that this is a depth at which fishes may live. The question as to how animals can resist the enormous pressure at those depths is discovered by Dr. Edwyn Jeffries, who suggests that water is nearly incompressible, and that [illegible] animals whose tissues are saturated by such a fluid, can have to a certain extent filled with it, would not possess [illegible] by the superincumbent [illegible].

The cultivation has been [illegible] and has become considerably profitable, so that the price of quinine has been [illegible] only reduced in India, and an exportation of the drug has already begun. The new industry promises to solve the question of the opium trade with China; for it will make it practicable to substitute quinine for opium as a febrifuge in those swamp districts of China where the opium is most used, while India will lose no revenue which they now enjoy, for they will still be the producers and the sellers of the substitute for it.

—Prof. G. C. Broadhead has contributed an interesting paper on the aborigines to the Kansas City Review. The earliest discovery of bones of this animal appears to have been made between Hudson and Hudson Albany, N. Y. Since that period skeletons nearly entire, detached bones, teeth, tusks, and mastodon have been found in nearly every State in the Union, including those of the Pacific slope. The animal seems to have first appeared in America in Miocene times, it was dominant in the Pliocene, and became extinct at the close of the Glacial Period. Dr. Agassiz from Canada sixty-six degrees north on our western coast to Nicaragua, Central America, [illegible] Lyell [illegible] Leipzig journal [illegible] to one gross trade, makes the following statement: "Place your tumblers [illegible] or vessels that you desire to keep from cracking, in a kettle filled with cold water, add a little cooking salt, and the moment the boiling point is reached remove all the vessels from the fire. Glass treated in this way is said never to crack, even if exposed to very sudden changes of temperature. Tumblers in particular, are said to become very durable by treating them in this way. CERTAIN SERIOUS EVILS WHICH THREATEN THE COMMUNITY CAREFULLY INVESTIGATED AND POSITIVE EVIDENCE OF A VALUABLE SATURE SECURED.

St Louis Globe-Democrat, Jan. 29.]

It is the manifest duty of every well conducted paper to keep its readers conversant, not only with the news from all parts of the world, but also with the details of events, when these details affect the public welfare. The climatic changes of America, the variations in civilization, or some other influences, have made great transformations in the human body which have attracted the attention not only of scientists, but of people in general. Very naturally the press has taken up the matter, and in Boston, Chicago and other prominent cities, searching investigations have been made.

These investigations conclusively prove that the causes of these changes are to be found, not in outward manifestations, but in the human kidneys or liver, and that the system is affected just in proportion as these organs are well or deranged. In order that the people of St. Louis as well as the inhabitants of other cities might know certainly regarding these matters, a representative of this paper was commissioned to secure such facts as would throw the best and most conclusive light upon this subject.

A call was made at the establishment of Mr. A. A. Melber, wholesale and retail druggist, 709 and 711 Washington avenue. Mr. E. T. Jones, the gentleman in charge of the retail department, said that he had noticed the attention which this subject was attracting throughout the land with much interest. His experience, covering a period of years, proved conclusively to him that the kidney and liver were the workshops of the human system, and that the change of climate, habits and mode of living customary in America tended to derange these organs most seriously. He had noticed, however, and especially during the last year, that many persons who had been most seriously affected were now well and apparently happy, and the belief in it the quiet conformity, the cause of this gratifying change had been brought about by the use of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. Mr. Jones mentioned one especially. It was that of a lady who had formed the habit with a complexion almost black in its hue, as the result of serious kidney and liver difficulties, but under the use of the remedy mentioned she had regained perfect well, and with a complexion as clear as the day. Any one not in the [illegible] Mr. Jones also knew of many other striking cases which this remedy had accomplished, showing that it was specific, a thorough medicine to counteract the diseases arising during the [illegible].

Having gained the most remarkable information, the interviewer next called at the [illegible] Pine street. The [illegible] found Mrs. H. M. Alvord, who, upon being questioned [illegible]

"For the past two years I have suffered greatly, a disease which [illegible] first appeared [illegible] I began to use Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. By the second bottle my relief was so great that I could dispense [illegible] I would scarcely be without it for [illegible] deprived of this remedy, and I have advised many of my friends to use it."

A call was then made at the residence of Mrs. Bernard Kiernan, No. 1121 Biddle street. Mr. Kiernan's sister-in-law for years had suffered [illegible] was [illegible] fever troubles, which at last developed into Bright's disease, and became so alarming as to swell his [illegible] to enormous proportions, and [illegible] to [illegible] agony [illegible] for [illegible] and nights in an [illegible] sleep at all. Her illness was considered [illegible] the physicians of the city, [illegible] regard [illegible] Mr. Kiernan [illegible] Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, and [illegible] to use it. Methods of Raising Church Funds.

Mr. Editor: A great deal has been written of late on the importance of reforming the moral Discipline of the Church: and certainly every lover of the Lord should rejoice at this evidence of awakened conscience and consecrated revival in this much needed and important particular. Let us not neglect this essential branch of our duty to our Master and to the flock of which the Holy Ghost has made us overseers; while we attend to this let us also be mindful and watchful of other interests of our Lord's heritage. While his ministers, endeavor to preserve the purity of the church in the lives of her membership, let us keep it from being defiled in another direction. I refer to our methods of raising funds. To the observant mind, pondering the condition of the church and her needs, it is evident that the two great dangers which threaten her in our day, arise from the worldly lives of many of her membership, unchecked by application of the law provided for such cases, and from methods of raising funds for her support, which are not only unscriptural but tend to degrade her in the eyes of the world. These things are generally found to prevail in the same place; there is consanguinity between them.

Under the last head I group church fairs, church suppers, cantatas, sacred concerts, et id genus omne. Probably worst of the whole bad lot is the self-pre-eminently "corrupt thing of evil," and adds sacrilege to flagrant blasphemous offense by drama in any part of Holy Writ, and under the name cantata or oratorio degrades the house of God to the political level of the lowest.

The evil of these things is easily seen. In the first place it puts the church before the world in a wrong light, making manifest to support itself she is beggar enough to confess her weakness by begging world for help. How humiliating, yet how true the confession that the church which is Christ-purified to the world to save the world and bring it into allegiance to Him, is unable to sustain herself, but must come and by worldly means beg that antagonistic world to help keep it alive!

What a confession in the face of these appeals! the world so ready to imbibe a contempt for religion, as dependent upon them for existence. Take this view of it and it does seem that self-respect would keep the church from resorting to expedients. But in addition to the harm it works to the subject when by any means you lessen the church's respect of the church, you lessen the chances of his salvation.

Look again, these expedients defeat the very end which they seek to promote, dwarfing its liberality and so delaying the resurgence of the church, educating people in a wrong direction, and it takes no prophet's eye to see it must eventually, and that at no distant day, tell disastrously upon the finances of the church. Certainly it is unfair to spirituality to look for a moral and immediate equivalent for offerings we bring to God, and we should flow freely from our consecration to Him. We are thus drying up the source from which has ever been, and must ever flow, the vast sums of the funds needed to sustain the church at home and carry on its enterprises for the conversion of the world. Our Lord came into the world to establish a kingdom or it while not of, and while this kingdom widely differs from all others in the manner of its creation, in the principles of its government and in the end which it seeks, has many points of similarity which we may trace with as much profit as we may derive from noting its points of contrast. One of the prime essentials to the prosperity and success of any government is a well devised system of raising the revenue for its support. And faithful negligence in this ground of this kingdom, and in the book which contains the constitution, and laws of that kingdom we read also the sanctified means of raising its revenue. The church would prosper if it must, in its character, obey its constitution in order to observe its laws. Other means of support than those laid down in this book are unconstitutional and illegal, resorting to them is guilty of a kind of presumption as well as an act of gross folly and shortsightedness. The only way of raising money we find in God's word, and we find that enjoined as alone acceptable to Him.

"Every man will offering. One must give cheerfully, gratefully, freely and as God has prospered him.

The revenue law of the kingdom is plainly and emphatically laid down in the charge of its laws and we have no right to violate it or set it aside to substitute or transgress any other established regulation of the kingdom.

When we go outside of the charter and expect to love money or use worldly methods to support the church, we put ourselves in the attitude to ask and expect God's blessing on our enterprises.

When we make merchandise of religion and an equivalent in worldly gain for a man's offering to the Lord, we occupy the same plane as that on which our Lord drove from the temple the sacrilegious profaners of his glory, and of his blessing."

A. L. LAMAR.

Whiskey—Whisky.

Mr. Editor: The increasing interest in the higher question has called my attention to the two ways of spelling the word, as I have written it. I was learned to spell it with o in it, even when I was a schoolboy. I know I have often appeared on rail-cars on the heads of barrels to tell what my grandma I. The dictionaries of the day, though not unanimous, sustain those who spell the word without e. I hope no one will undertake to notice how long our children have been going on in the way of the world, but it is not indeed, the two ways still have their fol. The inflections are strong, grand old letter "e" has been used in the whisky business, and we should have been brought into misery. It looked enough to do without making any change in whisky variety of it. Here is a public property, and we have the right to use, but not to abuse. They do most assuredly, but I persisted and they do to my full delight in beer, and I shall not shun an ale, but they are slipping me with "a mug of lager," the assumption of the whole business, drinking, rowdyism, drunkenness, moral, civil, darkness, murder, suicide, self-damnation, woe, weeping, desolation, despair, death and everlasting punishment. In all these things I appear as a helper, and in them I have been deceived and brought into trans. [illegible] I insist to the hell piety excuse me from whisky."

If complaints are in order, and letters have a right to speak, words and numbers ought to be heard also, on this question of spelling a word to signify a thing. Turnkey, Turkey, donkey and monkey appear as a classical it is agreed that monkey shall represent their cause and speak in their defense to save them from the shame and danger of such a companion as whiskey, an enemy to man, a disturber of the peace, a foul blot on civilization and fit only for imprisonment. Whereupon the turnkey bolted the door against whisky and then congratulated the company on their fortunate deliverance. Monkey chattered, leaped and danced for joy, and the whole class voted to keep the door locked.

"The number seven is consecrated in the holy books, and in the religion of the Jews by a great number of events and mysterious circumstances." This number of letters has been associated in whiskey. It is time for the consecrated number to testify against an unclean thing which has become so common and has produced so many unholy things. Let the glory of the number seven depart from the name of a liquor that has so degraded man, six letters are necessary to spell the word. It is not easy to abandon a practice even in spelling. But I give up the "e" in this word, and hope the time is not far in the future when many who have been friendly to the whisky business shall be able to see in it one of the greatest foes to our race, and that the church may soon see that in fighting against liquor the fire is against all of the best interests of the human family.

Sermons, Short or Long.

Mr. Editor: Why is there a demand for short or long sermons in some of our congregations? Is there less to be said in favor of the religion of Jesus Christ than there was in former times, or are the people more easily converted under short sermons, than they were under the style of preaching for the last eighteen hundred years? I have never known how the idea ever got into the heads of some of our congregations, that our preachers should be limited in the delivery of their sermons. I have never seen at the sessions of any of our conferences, anything upon this subject. So I conclude that neither our Conferences nor Bishops have advised the church to time the preachers, and not let them preach too long. In some of our churches clocks are placed in front of the pulpit as though the preacher was making a law speech, or dividing time with a political opponent. Sermons may sometimes be too long, but their length must depend upon the particular circumstances under which they are delivered. All that was ever said in favor of the religion of the Bible, must be repeated as long as Christ is preached as the Saviour of the world. When the Holy Ghost gets into the heart of the preacher, he gets into the hearts of his hearers, and then there will be no way-side stations to stop at. I fear the demand for time sermons originated not in the hearts of Christians, but in the heads of those who could sit for two hours and hear a clown organ organ grinder. We are told by Job: "There was a time when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also, to present himself before the Lord." I have no doubt he continues to present himself at our places of worship, and that he is in favor of mixing the preachers, and not allowing them to tax the patience of the people with long sermons. Let us have no compromise between Satan and the pulpit.

LAYMAN.

Pet Virtues.

Most men have a pet, and it is not always a fine horse, or dog, or parrot, but some idea which they have fondled, and nursed, and nugged, until, like a mother's only child, it seems dearer to them than all the other ideas of all other men. Christians have their pets their pet ways of working, their pet organizations and their pet doctrines about which they think, and talk, and pray, until it seems to them that no one believes anything, and no one is in earnest, unless he falls into their line of action. Thus men are one-sided and narrow in their views.

But the class of pets which are most dangerous to the church are pet virtues. Men have some particular gift of grace which by nature it is easy for them to exercise, and they make the most of that virtue. It is very easy for one man to be patient, and he throws all the power of his religion into patience, while perhaps the thing he most needs is long-patience, or activity, or faith. Another man is by nature generous, and he carries all the power of his grace in the direction of his pet virtue, neglecting prudence or patience. Now, the value of grace is not in that it makes us strong on the side of our natural virtues, but that it makes us triumph on the side of our natural defects.

The value of our religion is not seen in that it makes us sweet-tempered, but that it turns our sourness into sweetness; not that it makes us honest man more honest, but that it makes a dishonest man honest; and that it makes a temperate man temperate, but that it makes an intemperate man temperable; not that it makes a quarrelsome man peaceable, but that it makes a contentious man peaceable, not so much that it helps us to be what we are, as that it helps us to become what we are not; so that men looking at us will say we are other and better men than we used to be. He used to be intemperate, now he is temperate; or he used to be selfish, now he is generous; or he used to be unforgiving, and now he is forgiving; or he used to be obstinate, and now he is gentle; irritable and now he is patient; careless, and now he is prudent; inactive, and now he is active. The test by which we are not to try ourselves is not whether we have pet virtues or not, but whether we have pet vices.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

By GEO. E. WARING, Jr.

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—its sound analyses and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of permanent utility, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really simpler and wiser men.

Price, in Extra English Cloth, Gilt Back, Only $3 50.

CATARRH Is a Terrible Disease. Its fearful effects—corruption running down the throat, weak eyes, deafness, loss of voice, loss of smell, disgusting odors, nasal deformities, and finally consumption. Then, how to Treat it is ever aggressive. Ordinary treatments are worse than useless. It neglected while a cure is possible, it may rapidly develop into quick consumption. The most thorough, successful and pleasant treatment is

Dr. M. W. CASE'S CARBOLATE of TAR INHALANT

FOR CATARRH, ASTHMA, CONSUMPTION, Bronchitis & Deafness.

It does not require the patient to inspire for many days to demonstrate the value of Carbolate of Tar, the most healing and remedial agent known to science. Balsams and Cordials of the most healing and soothing properties are scientifically united with Pine Tree Tar, that the mere breathing converts them into odorless smoke or vapor. This is inhaled—taken right to the diseased parts. No heat, do hot water, simply breathing or breathing it, and you feel its healing power at once. This treatment is endorsed by physicians everywhere, and highly commended by thousands, who have used it with perfect satisfaction. FULL TREATMENT—Circulars, etc., Sent Free—Sent. Satisfaction Always Guaranteed. Address DR. M. W. CASE, 933 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

SHREVEPORT, March 29.—An engineer of the Texas Pacific railway arrived to-day, to go over the line of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas railway, which, it is reliably reported, has been purchased by Thomas A. Scott. The purchase only needs the ratification of the board of directors of the Texas Pacific, which meets next month, and the road is to be completed within eighteen months.

BOSTON, March 30.—The House yesterday defeated, by a vote of one hundred and twenty-two to seventy-six, the bill to give municipal suffrage to women.

COLUMBUS, O., March 30.—The snow of last night and to-day is the heaviest of the season, and is one foot in depth on a level. Railroad travel is suspended, and many families were unable to get out of doors until the huge drifts were cleared away.

PHILADELPHIA, March 30.—United States Marshal Keins received information this afternoon from Las Vegas, New Mexico, to the effect that James Currie, the murderer of Porter, the actor, was shot and killed at that place March 24.

WASHINGTON, March 30.—The National Board of Health were to-day advised that there are one hundred cases of scarlet fever in Charleston, and that during the week ending the 25th inst., there were nine deaths.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., March 30. Information has been received by the Times, of a terrific cyclone in Randolph county, Ala., which destroyed the home and killed the entire family of Mr. John Embrey, consisting of himself, wife and two children, while they were asleep.

HARTFORD, March 31.—The House of Representatives to-day defeated the proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

MAGNOLIA, March 31. There was a heavy white frost here yesterday morning, and heavier still, with some ice, this morning. It is feared that the peaches are killed.

CHICAGO, March 31.—A dispatch from McMinnville, Tenn., to the News says: Miss J. Virginia French, authoress, died at one o'clock this morning at her home, Nestletown, near here.

DANVILLE, March 31. The most tremendous tornado known here for years, passed over this section last night. It bore down obstructions in its path with resistless fury. A number of houses were blown down and many trees were uprooted and fences leveled. The full extent of the damage in the surrounding county has not yet been ascertained.

HARRISBURG, Pa., March 31.—In the House this evening a joint resolution submitting to the people an amendment to the constitution forever prohibiting, except for medicinal, mechanical and scientific purposes, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, passed the second reading, after considerable discussion, by a vote of ninety-eight to thirty-eight.

A number of amendments were offered and rejected, among them one to insert the word sacramental after mechanical.

STORY CITY, Iowa, March 31.—There are indications of a gorge in the Missouri river, reaching from a point fifteen miles above this city, at least as far as Springfield, Dakota. Seventy miles as the crow flies, most of the bottom land, and from five to fifteen miles wide, is flooded by gorges. The Town of Green Island, Neb., opposite Yankton, has been swept away. The inhabitants could be seen from Yankton clinging to their houses as they floated off. A large amount of stock is supposed to have been drowned.

GALVESTON, April 1.—Gen. Grant and family arrived here at 11 o'clock this morning. They leave for Vera Cruz to-morrow.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., April 1. Gov. Churchill to-day signed the act prohibiting the carrying or sale of revolvers, bowie knives, sword canes, brass or metal knuckles, in this State; it also applies to cartridges. The law is now in force.

DENVER, Col., April 1. A dispatch to the Durango News says the whole section of the country around Rio Arabia, New Mexico, is in a state of nervous excitement, and terror reigns supreme. The cause of the terror is a gang of desperadoes led by Ike Stockton, who, with his brother Port, have for years been depredating through New Mexico and Texas, murdering, stealing, etc. Less than a month ago Port Stockton, whose headquarters were near Farmington, entered a saloon in that town where a murder of ranchmen were drinking, and, as is customary, everybody was invited to take a drink, under the penalty of being shot on refusal. The ranchman not complying, Stockton drew a revolver, but was immediately shot and killed. Ike Stockton, hearing of this, collected a gang of six or seven desperadoes and started for Farmington, with the avowed purpose of killing every man who was present when Port was killed.

Since then they have been murdering ranchmen and cow boys, killing and stealing stock and defying the authorities. A vigilance committee was organized, but is powerless, the desperadoes being thoroughly acquainted with the country, well mounted, and having divided into three or four squads in order to evade them. Governor Wallace has called out the militia and the country is to be scoured until the desperadoes are run down.

GALVESTON, April 2. A special to the News from Newport says: There was ice and frost in the northern portions of this State last night. The fruit crop was greatly injured.

FOREIGN.

PARIS, March 29. The Intransigeant states that the arrest of Sophie Perofsky has plunged the Nihilists in to grief. The Nihilist committee has resolved if she is executed the Czar shall die.

NEW YORK, March 29. A messenger from Potchefstroom, reports that place surrendered, on the day peace was signed, after hard fighting, in which eighteen British soldiers were killed and ninety wounded. The Boers captured three thousand rounds of ammunition and two guns.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 1. The electors be members of the temporary council to assist the Commandant at St. Petersburg, provided for in the ukase issued yesterday, have been nominated. The Agence Russe, states that the government will grant the same coercive municipal institutions to other cities asking for them.

PANAMA, March 29. Advices from Lunsgrate that a war of races has broken out in the valley of Cauelo, where more than two thousand Chinamen have been barbarously murdered by negroes and Cholas on one plantation, six hundred inoffensive men were murdered in cold blood. All the cane field, sugar-houses, machinery, etc., have been burned and destroyed, and property to the value of millions has been wrecked by these miscreants. All foreigners have fled the valley, which is one of the most fertile and productive in Peru. Some of them have been killed.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 3.—The porte agrees to rectify the Persian frontier and cede Kholour to Persia, as demanded by England and Russia, in accordance with the treaty of Berlin.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 4.—There were fresh shocks of earthquake at Chio today. The inhabitants are taking refuge on board of steamers in the harbor. The Governor and some of the officials have quitted the town.

ATHENS, April 4.—A Government dispatch has been received concerning the earthquake at Chio, which states that its effects was also felt at Tesme and that the number of persons who were killed and injured is estimated at three thousand.

A. T. STEWART'S BODY. "Faith," the well-informed correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, says the body of A. T. Stewart has never been recovered. That is the information I have from persons close to Judge Hilton. The thieves who stole it relied upon a woman's weakness to redeem the body at a costly price. But to the same religious feelings Mrs. Stewart's friends appealed when they told her that if she purchased these poor bones no man would be safe in his grave; that they were not necessary to the repose of her husband's soul, and that if he could appear to her in spirit, he would tell her never to give one cent to keep alive such an example. Hence the grave robbers had their nasty work, and subsequent expense and long waiting on a reward for nothing. I once asked Judge Hilton for information on the subject, and he said: "I would probably tell you if I had anything to say, but the newspaper discussion of the subject is mainly designed to assist thieves and exhort money from Mrs. Stewart. When the subject dies out, and the wounds of the hour are healed, it may be time to talk up that question."

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT. Shall we have a cheap official edition? The help of our readers is asked to secure it. It is believed that the English Oxford Press, (the official publishers) would be willing to issue a cheap popular edition of the New Testament, provided they can be convinced that the demand for such an edition in this country is great enough to warrant it. To test the extent of this demand, our readers are requested to send at once to I. K. Funk & Company, 10 and 12 Dey St., New York, their names, stating how many copies they are willing to take for themselves and friends, provided the price per copy be not more than twenty-five cents, postage free. These would be the official copies printed in Oxford, England, from the original plates, and would be delivered in America simultaneously with the high-priced edition.

WHATSOEVER DOEST QUICKLY DO.

Why thus doeth quickly do
In my Master's work take hold
Ere the fall-time in the grow,
Ere the harvest-field be cold.
Ere the gates of heaven be rent,
Ere the trumpet-peal be blown,
Ere the Lord from heaven descend,
And the midnight cry be known.

Make the paths to ease,
Make the crooked straight,
Speak truth in pulpit, press, and place,
Haste, O ye who heaven await!
Young and old alike are leaving
Time and earth for the grave; go ye!
Each one hurries through the living
World to death. Oh, work while ye may!
What thou doest, quickly do!

—From the Hymns of W. J. R. Thomason.

Methodist Ecumenical Conference.

The following is taken from the London, London, March 16, 23:

A very important meeting of the great Wesleyan bodies in Great Britain and Ireland was held yesterday (Tuesday) in London to consider a report of the Executive Committee and to make further arrangements for the forthcoming Conference. Some special difficulties that have arisen in consequence of the wishes of the Wesleyans in the United States of America to have certain questions discussed, which have been formally excluded by the original basis of agreement as it was accepted by the bodies on the Atlantic, Among suggestions made in America for the work of the Conference were the following: Reviewing and comparing standards of doctrine recognized by the several Connections, the Creeds eliminating the Shibboleths of the Athanasian Creed; Anglican Confession, as abridged and revised by Mr. Wesley; and the Shorter Catechisms prepared by Richard Watson, and adopted by the Wesleyan Conference as well as the Irish, to inquire in what sense the Irish Conference recognizes the Forty Sermons of John Wesley, and Notes on the New Testament, and are not recognized as standards by any other Connection; and whether the judgment of living clearly at any time may supersede all written standards. One American writer goes on to suggest some might desire the adoption of a Pentecostal Creed or Confession in which might be embodied by the distinctive views of Methodism on the Witness of the Spirit, Sanctification, and Eschatology concerning which there have been some dissensions in certain quarters; in what sense Watson's Institutes may be considered a standard of doctrine, polity, and worship. The writer suggests many other subjects for consideration and discussion. He suggested departures from the usual programme caused considerable uneasiness among British Wesleyans, and caused many to attend the recent Convention in London. There was a universal feeling in the Convention that the original basis should not be departed from, as the special subjects could not be discussed in the time allotted to the Conference, and because they were foreign to its purpose. The Executive Committee reported that they had considered the subject of doctrinal questions, and were unanimous in thought that they should be excluded. The Rev. H. W. Holland urged the Convention should pass a resolution sustaining the Executive in their decision. If by discussion it was meant that their decisions should be upheld and considered as instruments of salvation there was no objection to it. But to open discussions, and then dispute as to the value of the variations would be better let alone. The proposition to consider the value of standards, the amount of their authority, and the source whence their authority was derived, would be more suitable if they were going to have a trial in a court of law, and was foreign to the fraternal objects of the Conference, and also contrary to them. Dr. Osborn spoke against doctrinal discussion, and said if Mr. Holland would move a resolution he would second it; and after further consideration, Dr. Osborn moved, and Dr. Cooke seconded, a resolution approving the work of the Executive as a whole, and especially in the exclusion of doctrinal discussion. The resolution was carried unanimously, and there is no doubt it will be accepted in America, and so will end the temporary difficulty of questions of doctrines, standards, and polity. It was suggested by the American Executive that the term Congress with them was technical and political, and in deference to their wishes, the Conference agreed to go back to the original title, and call the coming gathering the Ecumenical Conference.

It was suggested from America that Friday, August 5, should be observed as a day of special prayer by Methodists throughout the world for the blessing of God upon the forthcoming Ecumenical Conference, and the Convention cordially and unanimously agreed to the suggestion. It was agreed to request Bishop Simpson, of the United States, to preach a sermon before the members of the Conference on the subject of Christian union.

Some conversation arose on the subject of the Guarantee Fund. The Executive had agreed that the sum of twelve pounds ten shillings should be raised for each representative by the body sending him, and it was agreed that the Guarantee Fund should amount to £2,500. It was urged by Mr. Mawson that more money would be raised if they left it to the spontaneous liberality of their people, but it was finally agreed to make no alterations in the arrangements for the Guarantee Fund, but it was understood that each Wesleyan denomination should raise its guarantee fund in its own way.

Alderman H. J. Atkinson said they should keep to their engagements with the Guarantee Fund, and not play fast and loose with them.

The Conference will consist of two general divisions, the eastern and western sections, with their affiliated Conferences and missions. The eastern section to consist of Episcopal and non-Episcopal Methodists, and the western section to consist of the Wesleyan Conference Methodists and the Methodists of all other denominations.

Several working Committees were appointed—the Reception Committee, the Publication Committee, and the Business Committee, the first Committee having power to add to its numbers.

The Conference will commence on Wednesday, September 7, and will be held for two sessions—the first in Leicester and the second in Leeds. At one time it was under consideration to divide the Conference into sections, owing to the multiplicity of subjects to be considered, but this is now abandoned, and the whole Conference will meet together each day in two sessions, forenoon and afternoon, the evening being reserved for devotional and public meetings. In connection with the Conference it will probably be arranged to hold meetings by deputation in most of the large towns in England, such as Bristol, Liverpool, Birmingham and Hull.

As the proposals now stand there will be some thirty-eight topics for discussion, which would require about fifteen writers of papers and nineteen speakers from the western and about nine from the eastern sections.

Some discussion followed as to the appointment of the respective speakers and writers. The programme of exercises proposed by the western section (United States) was considered and practically adopted, with the exception of the following topic, which was declined on account of its doctrinal character: "The doctrinal basis of Methodism: 1. The doctrinal basis of Methodism stated, and shown to be in harmony with the best Biblical exegesis. 2. The doctrinal basis of Methodism historically exhibited. 3. The doctrinal basis of Methodism logically and philosophically maintained. 4. The doctrinal basis of Methodism an inspiration to Christian activity, in order to secure growth in grace and the salvation of lost men." But though the doctrinal topic is declined as a part of the proceedings of the Ecumenical Conference in September next, there would be no desire in England to prevent the Wesleyans in the United States from publishing a volume on the subject, and on their own account, and before coming to the Ecumenical Conference; and its seperate and independent publication would form a valuable contribution to the history of Methodist belief, conviction, spiritual life, and Christian activity.

The following is an outline for each day's proceedings during the twelve days of the Ecumenical Conference, though it may undergo some modifications hereafter:

First Day, September 7.—Sermon by Bishop Simpson; address of welcome and responses.

Second Day, September 8.—Methodist history—but its results—grateful recognition of the hand of God in the origin and progress of Methodism; Methodism as a popular movement sanctifying and elevating society.

Third Day, September 9.—Evangelical agents of Methodism, ministerial and lay, woman's work in the Church; spiritual holiness.

Fourth Day, September 10.—Methodism and the young; training young people in Christian homes and day and Sunday schools.

Fifth Day, September 12.—Historic relation of Methodism to the temperance reformation; the relation of the temperance reform to other reforms, especially to the observance of the Sabbath; juvenile temperance organization and their promotion through the Sunday-school, etc.

Sixth Day, September 13.—Possible perils to Methodism: 1. From the Papacy, from Sacerdotalism and its connected errors; 2. from modern scepticism in its different forms and manifestations; 3. from formality, worldliness, and improper diversions in our own members, and the consequent loss of spirituality; 4. from innovations upon established Methodist usages and institutions, and a resultant diminution of denominational efficiency.

Seventh Day, September 14.—Education: The higher education demanded by the necessities of the church in our time; the duty of the church to maintain schools which are Christian in their influence and character; the education and special training of ministers in theological schools, etc.

Eighth Day, September 15.—The use of the press for the advancement of Christianity: periodical publications of every grade, except those designed for children; denominational book publishing houses, are they desirable? and, if so, how ought they to be managed so as most effectively to promote Christianity? Juvenile literature: its importance, its production, and its distribution; the daily news organ, and the use to be made of it in the Church.

Ninth Day, September 16.—Home Missions: Montgomery conversions amongst the poorest and most degraded populations. The important work which the Methodist laity have performed in this and in other directions, and the great opportunities which they have for the future. The duty of providing houses of worship for the poor. Methodism and its work for orphans, for the aged, etc.

Tenth Day, Sept. 17.—Foreign Missions: The results of Methodism in Pagan lands. The relation of the foreign work to the home work. How to avoid waste, rivalry, and confusion of the Pagan mind from different Methodist bodies occupying the same or contiguous fields. The establishment and support of training schools for native converts.

Eleventh Day, Sept. 19.—Foreign missions continued: The use of the press in non-Christian countries for the promotion of the Gospel. The mission work required in Papal and semi-infidel nations. The special need of co-operative Methodism in Papal and Pagan lands. The resources of Methodism in numbers, wealth, organization, and spiritual life for the work of the world's conversion, and the best methods of developing and employing these resources.

Twelfth Day, September 20.—Christian unity: how Christian unity may be maintained and increased among ourselves, and made manifest to the world; for instance, by a common hymnal, a uniform order of worship, and co-operative labors at home and abroad. The catholicity of Methodism as manifested in its polity and history. Methodism as a bond of brotherhood amongst the nations.

The President of the next Wesleyan Conference, which will be held in Liverpool, will have much to do with the Ecumenical Conference, and much interest is being taken in the question: Who will be the next President?

The minister who said he could preach without notes has been taken at his word by his congregation, which refuses to pay his salary. He sees his mistake.

The Whisky War.

The first great battle in the great national whisky war was fought and won at Topeka, the capitol of the State of Kansas, on the 19th day of February, 1881. Kansas is the banner State, and will wear the imperishable honor time immemorial. On the above date the Governor of Kansas approved a law there enacted by her legislature, which throttles the whisky king to perfect strangulation. It will soon be seen whether prohibition prohibits. I believe it will. Partial prohibition has not met the expectation of its friends, absolute prohibition is likely to do it.

All honor to the State of Kansas! She takes the lead in the great American Reformation. In this she will wear imperishable honor, and enjoy the unending thanks and gratitude of a great nation and her unborn millions of future ages. And when it shall be seen, as it probably will be, that prohibition does prohibit, we may look for a Kansas whisky law in every State in the Union, and national prohibition by the United States Congress also.

"Why not?" Most national suicide and self-impoverishment and State and national degradation, and wholesale moral delinquent, and wide-spread pauperism, and increase of prisons, and national cultivation of weeping widowhood and squalid orphanage, be built up, encouraged, and propagated, as a distinguishing feature of the only nation on earth of true elementary greatness, in order to pamper and enrich a few thousand parasite whisky men? This is the great American question. And America must answer it.

The following is the title of the Kansas law: "An Act To prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medical, scientific and mechanical purposes, and to regulate the manufacture and sale thereof for such excepted purposes." Except for these specified purposes, the law is absolutely sweeping. The act is written by a master hand and is a scholarly piece of legal and literary composition. In this "regulation" it is elaborate and closes every possible opening to fraud or evasion. To sell for medicine there must be a license, by a practical druggist from the Probate court, under affidavit, bond and proof to the Judge, and recorded prescription by a practical physician and in case only of actual sickness. The doctor can neither buy or furnish it himself. For mechanical and scientific uses it is fully guarded at every point. All is done under license, affidavit, bond and public registry of each case of sale, by physicians' prescription or otherwise, and adequate penalty. The manufacturers can only sell in original packages. Prohibition also includes barter, use or giving away.

I am glad it makes no exception for "sacramental purposes." I wish to see the question answered, practically whether Christians are under obligations to whisky men and doggery keepers for the means of religious worship. Let prohibition reach the churches first! Do churches need the merchandise of social ruin and public and private degradation and crime? Would not a pound of raisins, steeped in a pail of clean hot water, strained and cooled, do quite as well as commercial wine and whisky? Let us try it.

I regard this Kansas liquor law as one of the most important and most valuable State papers that ever emanated from any legislative hall on this continent, the Constitution of the United States not excepted. It may lead to moral, social and national reform and prosperity such as we have scarcely dared to hope for.

The battle between ruin and prosperity must come. Let it come! On the side of the latter will be arrayed millions of money, and on the other the honest votes of an honest people seeking emancipation from a monster tyrant.

Perish the Democratic party if need be! Perish the Republican party if need be! Perish official aspirations, nominations and preferences for place if need be! Let the public welfare be paramount.

Whistler.

While at Mobile I met Rev. W. S. Wade, who is in charge of the Methodist church at Whistler, Alabama, situated five miles north of Mobile on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. At his invitation I spent le Sabbath among his people and was pleased to see the congregation seated in close proximity to the pulpit. There were a majority of men in attendance. The official board is composed of men, few if any, who are over thirty-five years of age.

Monday morning Brother Wade accompanied me to the car works. We found the master machinist, R. H. Briggs, a very courteous gentleman. He kindly bade us enter, and inspect at our leisure.

The tool room, to nearest the gate entrance, under charge of Mr. Goode, foreman of the machine shop. He very kindly conducted us into the mysteries of his department. I was pleased to see the neatness, order, system and dispatch that greets your eyes at every turn. Skilful mechanics make and mend all the tools used in the shops.

As you pass through the machine shop, you see men at work at machines turning, boring and planing iron and brass: and as you watch the apparent ease with which these perfect machines work, you forget the density of metals as ribbons of iron roll gracefully away. Here is the hospital of the iron-horses; some need new eyes, arms, legs, lungs, bodies, everything; coming in shattered wrecks, they go out flushed beauties, entirely new.

The skill and power of man is wonderful: it is seen here in a thousand forms.

I stood an interested witness before a huge locomotive driving wheel waiting for an axle, while two men working the lever of a small hydraulic pump, using the immense pressure of forty-five tons, slowly pressed the axle into its place. Then, again, in the black smith shop, it is marvellous to witness the huge forge, or trip-hammer, of 1,500 pounds weight, strike a blow of 7,000 pounds, or of sufficient force to simply crack the shell of a pecan.

The steel scissors clip half inch plate iron, as if it were cheese. There is an improved Corliss engine that imparts life to all the machinery, and it would astonish some housekeepers to see the neat, clean room where it labors, more like a parlor than an engine room.

Mr. J. T. Booth, master car builder presides over the wood work department. He turns out every kind of car, of home grown woods. The beautiful passenger cars now in the M. and O. R. R. came out of his shop and are a moving advertisement of his skill. The crowning feature of this car works is the order, quiet, sober, God-fearing employees. No wonder when the majority are Christian men.

Many thanks for courtesies received at hands of Messrs. Briggs, Booth, Goode, Daughtrity, Handley, Chartres, and Timms, and the pastor of Whistler station.

The Minutes and Homer District.

As explanations are in order, I desire to correct several errors in the minutes in regard to Homer District, viz.:

Downsville circuit.—The minutes show four parsonages. There is no parsonage there, but Bro. Brown is trying to secure one.

Rochester circuit.—No parsonage reported. There is a parsonage at Sibley camp ground, on that circuit.

Farmerville circuit.—No parsonage there. Four are reported.

Webster circuit.—Two parsonages reported—none there.

Minden, Sparta, Arcadia and Rochester, show no receipts for presiding elder. These all paid the presiding elder, and Bro. Stone says were properly reported.

Homer shows no missionary collections from Sunday-schools. There was a good collection at Liston Sunday-school and the money paid over and properly reported.

Haynesville circuit. Has no "other church property" reported. It has one of the best camp grounds in the District.

Arcadia circuit.—Has five churches (as the minutes show) valued at $2,300, but the "Total value of church property" is put down at $300 00.

Many of these errors I have reason to believe, lie at the door of the printer. I had occasion for examining the minutes, during the last days of the session of Conference, and found every subject to which I referred correct.

Unless we can get a more accurate statement of facts it might be better to keep the $112 30, paid for "printing minutes," in the missionary treasury.

In this connection, allow me to explain a matter, which extends beyond Homer District. Our page 10, instead of giving the amount of Conference collection, "as per Treasurer's Report," that report is ignored, but the figures I think, correct. On page 11, the amount is given as $666 35 less than was paid, showing a decrease of $170 20 instead of an increase of $129 60.

J. A. Parker.

C. T. Monaghan, preacher in charge of Webster circuit, Homer District, Louisiana Conference, writing April 5, 1881, says: Our first quarterly meeting, embracing the first Sabbath, and Saturday before, was well attended. Congregations large and attentive. Official members were nearly all present, answering to their names. Our presiding elder, Rev. James A. Parker, was on hand, and, as usual with him, did some able preaching; also Rev. Phill Purkett. On Sunday we had the pleasure of witnessing forty-eight communicants partake of the supper of our Lord.

We report, for the first quarter, three adult baptisms and six infants baptized; twelve accessions to the church; finances healthy; assessment for Conference claimants paid in full; one fourth of the presiding elder's claim paid; also one fourth of the preacher's salary paid. We hope to bring up our Conference collection in full. The ADVOCATE is taken extensively, and we are trying to introduce it in every family. We are going to try and have a camp meeting in the bounds of the circuit, and would be glad to have the editor of the ADVOCATE with us. Pray for us, and the cause of the Master, and for an outpouring of the spirit of God on us.

Good Words.

The hour draws nigh, when evening shades
Stretched out shall be in checkered glades,
And earth's familiar landscape fades,
When death around its darkness flings,
Be these mysterious shadowings
The shade of the Almighty's wings?
When the last summons comes to me,
Like angel whisp'ring let it be
"The Master's come and calls for thee."
And friends who final vigils keep,
With this glad thought will cease to weep
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

Are angels my attendants? Then I should walk worthy of my companionship. Am I so soon to go and dwell with angels? Then I should be pure. Are these feet so soon to tread the courts of heaven? Is this tongue soon to unite with heavenly beings in praising God? Are these eyes so soon to look on the throne of eternal glory and on the ascended Redeemer? Then those feet and eyes and lips should be pure and holy, and I should be dead to the world, and live for heaven. Albert Barnes.

In the humblest dwellings and in the obscurest corners, the noblest, the most successful, and the most honorable lives are lived as truly as on the wide avenues, and beneath the gaze of myriads of admiring eyes. TWO MORNINGS.

BY SARAH O. JEWETT.

In armor strong the fearless knight
At daybreak rode away.
And from her window in the tower
The lady watched all day.

There stood that morning by the gate
A little page to see,
And wished he'd be, in years to come,
As grand a knight as he.

All day the idle echoes brought
Like noises in a dream,
The roar of fighting from afar,
The clashing of a stream.

And when the stars came, one by one,
The lady could not sleep;
She feared the shadows in the room,
She heard the waters leap.

The daylight lingered fair it came,
And hardly with surprise
She heard the tale the setting sun brought,
With terror in their eyes.

How at the close barred castle gate
At daybreak they had found
The knight's horse, which came drooping in Weak with a mortal wound.

Oh all forlorn and eyeless,
Stained with his lord's blood,
With human sorrow in his look,
He bent and trembling stood.

The lady did not speak. She came
Beside the horse to stand;
She kissed the bridle where the knight
Had held it in his hand;

And all that day she longed and feared
To hear the soldiers tread
When they came marching up the steep
To bring the knight his dead.

She wished the wrong would fall on her
She hoped that she might die
She longed to be the little page,
Who had not to cry.

Sunday-School Lesson.

Second Quarter Lesson IV.

COVETOUSNESS.

SUNDAY, APRIL 17.—LUKE XII. 13-21.

13. And one of the company said unto him, Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me.

14. And he said unto him, Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?

15. And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness, for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

16. And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully:

17. And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?

18. And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods.

19. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.

20. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?

21. So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.

The selfishness of a man who impolitely intrudes his own interest upon the Saviour, while he is delivering one of his great sermons, furnishes the subject of our lesson. This singular and untimely interruption of the Lord, while preaching, called forth a rebuke and a lesson upon covetousness.

Verse 13. "Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." He was one of that class of men whose highest conception of religion is their own personal advantage. This man felt sincerely that his rights were worthy of engaging the attention and enlisting the help and authority of the great Teacher. He perceives Christ's moral power over men, and he proposes to use it for his own personal benefit. He hears the sermon and is impressed with its power, and thinks to use the great Teacher to do a stroke of business for himself. What an example of godless simplicity. Without any idea of any impropriety in his request, with no appreciation of a rebuke, he unwittingly shows his thoroughly selfish spirit, and discovers to all his character. He was full of his wrongs; he felt the surpassing injustice of his wrongs, and that his rights have paramount claims upon the attention of all. The most dangerous form of covetousness is that which listens to Christ to get worldly advantage. That love of the world which, while keeping itself within the limits of decency and legality, yet takes all the affections of the heart from God, and robs divine things of all their interest; against such we need continually to be warned. Some men see no impropriety in using the church as an advertisement of themselves. They feel that they have good reason to expect the church's endorsement of their business, and that they do right in leaving the church when it is not given. Our Christian Advocates are subscribed to and read by some persons chiefly because they see in them their own names in striking capitals and complimentary notices of their fine business qualities, with attractive cuts of the grand emporiums over which they preside. May its circulation be doubled if these sincere but not disinterested wish.

Selfishness in this, its ugliest form, is never more exhibited than when it shows itself on the side of religion.

Christ's reply touches us that he has not as yet ascended the throne as Judge.

Verse 14. "Man, who made me a judge, or a divider over you?" Our Lord distinctly refuses on all occasions, to meddle with temporal affairs of men. Observe the case of the tribute money, and of the woman taken in adultery. He came to establish a spiritual kingdom, which was indeed in its growth, to leaven the whole world, but any interference with worldly affairs then would only have encouraged false notions of the Messiah, which prevailed among the Jews, who looked for a temporal King and Deliverer.

Christ's reply shows that this was no part of his business, and therefore impliedly no part of the church's business to settle personal and secular disputes. The Roman Catholic Church aspires to this, and, where she has been able to assert her temporal power, the result has been corruption within and oppression without.

The work of Christ and his true followers is to instill such principles, and produce such a spirit in men that they shall not seek their own, but rather the things of another, and thus give no place for disputes, and, should there be any, they could peacefully settle it among themselves upon the broad principle of love.

Verse 15. And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

Our Lord proceeds at once to attack the evil which was at the root of this man's request. He who knew what was in man saw perfectly the true motive of this man. Beware, take heed, covetousness is like a serpent that coils himself in your bosom and devours the food you eat. I have read of a child who was always hungry; he was ever crying for food, ever eating and ever hungry; more bread, more, more, ever more was his constant cry. The doctor was called, and, by some wonderful operation, he fished a great serpent out of the poor boy's stomach. The secret was revealed; the food had all been devoured by the serpent.

Beware of this serpent. Covetousness is a passion of fallen humanity. It has a strange history, often of honest birth, the child of forethought, but, changing its character rapidly with its growth, it goes blind, losing sight of the ends in the means, till wealth is sought, grasped, hoarded and loved for itself, and not for the advantage it may confer. Your body would stand a better chance in the coils of the constrictor than your soul in coils of covetousness.

Verse 15. "And he spake a parable unto them," to show them what life is and what it is not. The parable shows that a man's life doth not consist in what he has, but what he is; that is, his true life, that life which is alone worthy of the name, the eternal life, in no way consists in outward things. "Man doth not live by bread alone;" bread nourishes the life of the body, the true life is of heaven, and must have heavenly food. Read the parable of the rich fool. The statement is clearly made in the incident that the success of this rich man was not the result of unfair dealing. He used God's earth, God's sunshine, God's rain, and took advantage of God's great laws of the harvest, and wielded them so as to amass great wealth.

The rich planter is taken to illustrate this vice, not because successful covetousness is any worse than unsuccessful covetousness, but because the danger lies in innocent increase. There is nothing to awaken conscience in this honest enlargement of his fortune. It was his ground that brought forth plentifully in response to his honest toil. "The prosperity of fools shall destroy them." "If riches increase, set not your heart upon them," is good advice, and wise the prayer of Agar: "Give me neither poverty nor riches." What shall I do? The question could have been answered in a better way than he answered it for himself. Thou hast barns enough; the bosoms of the needy, the homes of the widows, the mouths of the orphans. In these barns he might have stored up his goods to find them again in heaven. St. Augustine has a noble passage addressed to one perplexed to know where to store his abundant wealth, and in danger of losing it. "God does not wish you to lose your riches; only to change their place. If a friend, finding that you had stored your corn in a damp room, where it was rotting away, were to advise you to remove it to a higher chamber, where it would be safe, you would listen to his advice; yet you will not listen to Christ bidding you to raise your treasures from earth to heaven, where you will receive, not, indeed, what you have thus laid up, but, instead of these perishable things, eternal, instead of earth, heaven."

Verse 18. "My fruits and my goods." How like the world he speaks, as if all were his own, and that he might do as he liked with his own.

Verse 19. "Soul, thou hast much goods," etc. Verily, a true picture of many a man whom the world honors, God approves. It is not a rare thing for one who has made or inherited large wealth to lay his plans for the future, with the sole view of pleasing himself and enjoying himself.

Verse 20. "But God said unto him, Thou fool," etc. It is not much to be called a fool by men; they may be mistaken, and their estimate does not make you one, but when God calls one fool we know the name is significant of character. He was a four-fold fool. He left his soul's interest out of all his calculations. He put body before soul. He put time before eternity, and self before God, and reversed the whole order of truth. There is no measure by which we can gauge his folly; it is gregious, profound, eternal. He had thoroughly furnished his body, but no provision as made for his soul. God spoke to him in the decree which emptied his dream: "This night thy soul shall be required of thee." The righteous will joyfully commit his soul to God; from the wicked it is exacted with stern terror.

He is not as a ship which has long been waiting in harbor, and joyfully, when the signal is given, lifts its anchor and makes sail for the harbor of eternity; but like a ship which, by some fierce wind, is dragged from its moorings, and is driven furiously to perish on the rocks.

Verse 21. So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God. This Christ points the parable at this man, whose petition gave rise to it, and against all who lay up treasure upon earth.

Be it much or be it little upon which the heart is set, it matters not. There may be rich who have their treasure above, and poor who have it below. When the treasure is there the heart is also there. The true riches may be lost for the little hundful as surely as for thousands of gold and silver.

We Want Prohibition.

MR. EDITOR: In the ADVOCATE of March 17 there is a letter from T. L. Mellen that is, I think, liable to do much harm. He is replying to "Gilderoy," for an article which he had written in favor of prohibition. This people want such a law; they are tired to death of the tyranical rule of "king alcohol." They want the people to pass a law against intemperance, just as they do any other evil, and, whether they accomplish a complete reformation or not, is the law stand as evidence that the evil is condemned by the good people of the land. I have no doubt that Bros. Mellen and Gilderoy are both honest and sincere in their opinions, but I think Bro. Mellen has made several mistakes. First in referring to his actions as a member of the Legislature in regard to the "pint law." He said that he recognized the fact that prohibition does not prohibit; that the only way to do it is to watch the saloons; in other words, moral suasion. The mistake he makes here is that he separates the two. It will take both to accomplish the work. Temporal punishment and law were and are always necessary to regulate society, for through it we point to the higher law of God. He might as well say that the only way to stop stealing, murder, fornications, adultery, etc., is by moral suasion; therefore we have no right to force people to do right by law. We say give us moral suasion and prohibition, too, for by it we testify to the rising generation that it is wrong, and thereby regel their consciences and turn them from the evil. Let us not be like the man who told his son not to chew tobacco, and at the same time was pushing a chew into his mouth. Such moral suasion never effects a cure.

2. He says: "Prohibition may force men to secrecy, and thereby encourage false swearing and greater evils." We want to force them to secrecy, and thereby compel their own acts to testify that they are evil. I hope he does not mean to say that because there are men in the land who will lie if necessary, to carry on their evil traffic, that the law which condemns the evil is to blame. We hold that if there are men of such a character that they will lie in order to accomplish their end, that that character stands already condemned before God, whether they ever utter the lie or not.

3. He says: "The use of liquor is neither sinful or harmful: it is the abuse that does the damage." Oh! how often have we heard this from the moderate drinkers. How long has it been going the rounds? I am afraid Bro. Mellen is guilty of a little recklessness here, for in the same article he says when the thirst for drink is acquired the man will have it, in spite of all prohibition. We believe this and more: we believe that a man will sell the very coat from off his back to satisfy this thirst; my more, that he will take the very bread from his loving wife and children in order to satisfy this thirst. Men have been known to drink the alcohol from off dead bodies. Yea, I myself have seen men so crazed with this appetite that I verily believe if I had stood between them and the glass that they would have plunged a knife into my heart. Oh! what is it whisky will not make a man do? And yet Bro. Mellen says there is no harm in its use. We cannot say so; for how was this appetite formed if not by first using it.

4. He says: "I venture to assert that in this broad country the abuse of liquor is not doing as much harm as is the use and abuse of opium." We might infer that Bro. Mellen was trying to justify one wrong by telling us that there is a greater one in the land. Whenever it is shown that opium is doing more harm than good, then we are in favor of prohibition against it too. Bro. Mellen says "he recollects when no man entertained company without setting out for his guests the oldest wines and best brandy he could get. That custom, thank God, is obsolete." The custom may be, but the fruit of it is ripe unto harvest. Now, instead of having the best around the fireside, the small keg gets a "goal," of "rot gut" and a pack of cards in his pocket, and he is fixed for the times. Bro. Mellen first tells us there is no harm in taking a little, and then tells us to "make allowances for the frailties and appetites of men," which were formed by taking a little when there was "no harm in it." We believe that temperance means the moderate use of all good things, and total abstinence in regard to all evil. We want prohibition; we pray for it. We also want moral suasion. We pray that God's ministers may be more fully awakened, and that all the moral suasion possible may be brought to bear on the minds and consciences of men by the glorious gospel. Believing, as we do, that all the tendencies of liquor are degrading, that it is unclean, we believe that God condemns it. Therefore we pray that the time may soon come when we will not only fully accept God's law, but that the law of all the people may be "a copy, Lord, of thine."

JACKSON, March 19, 1881.

May Not Sanctification be Lost and Justification and Regeneration be Retained?

MR. EDITOR: I observe much in your columns on the subject of sanctification. I rejoice that the church is being stirred up on this great doctrine of Wesley and Fletcher—this distinctive feature of Methodism.

While justification is a "clearing from guilt" process, and regeneration a "creating anew" process, sanctification seems to be a cleansing from all defilement process. Do they occur in quick succession in the order in which they are named? Or, must a space of time, more or less protracted, suffice for this work? Or, are these blessings conferred simultaneously and instantaneously? Well accredited Christian experience furnishes testimony, infallible, in proof of each and all. Spiritual phenomena is most difficult to trace and define. The mazes and labyrinths through which we are called to pass defy our spiritual discernment. There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit. Blessed be God! each may know of himself and for himself. But let us go back a moment. Justification may be understood as what is done for us; regeneration what is done in us; sanctification what is done by us. I hope none will take alarm for the safety of the ark of the Lord just here. Done by us, assisted and thoroughly furnished by the superabounding grace of God. It is the cap-stone, and we must cry "grace, grace, unto it!" Hence, the Lord said to Moses, when he was about to go up into the mount to receive the law, and the people were to be favored with one of the most wonderful manifestations of the Divine glory mortal man ever witnessed: "Sanctify them, and be ready against the third day." Ex. xx. In that remarkably significant part of the Scriptures, where the law of cleansing and purification is set forth, we find this language: "Sanctify yourselves, therefore, and be holy, for I am the Lord your God; and ye shall keep my statutes and do them. I am the Lord which sanctify you." Lev. xx. 7, 8. Here you observe the people "sanctify themselves," and at the same time the "Lord sanctifies them." "Co-workers together with God." The human and Divine agencies are employed. Hence, "work out your own salvation, for it is God who worketh in you, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." Faith in this is shown by works. "Therefore, leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection, sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord, grow in grace, be ye holy."

Good works (and they can be done only in faith), meet and acceptable, the legitimate fruits of regeneration, assures sanctification, attests heart purity, and furnishes one of the sure evidences of its presence. Feeling and emotion enter in, and are more or less realized, very much according to the peculiar temperament. The affections, sentiments and desires of the heart, and the outward actions of the life, are all centered and full heart on Christ Jesus.

Every step in this is by the infinite provisions of Divine grace on the part of God, and faith, all-conquering, all-victorious faith, on the part of the individual.

May not sanctification be lost, then, while justification and regeneration are retained? "There is no sin unto death" (1 John v.). The clearing from the guilt of sin, justification, the pardon of sin, regeneration, may be retained, while the work of sanctification may be arrested by unobserved sin, natural weakness, ignorance and the infirmities of poor, frail human nature, and thus progression, development, advancement, growth is arrested, till repentance and faith again exercised, introduces us again that high plane of sanctification. The ingredients of this cup seem to be unstaggering, unfaltering faith in the promises of God Almighty, and good works, and that to the full extent and measure of our ability. Love is faith, for faith and works attest each the other. Then the "peace of God, which passeth all understanding," fills and imbues the soul; that "peace" which the blessed Saviour left as an inheritance to the church: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you." The blessed Dove of peace can then light down upon us and say "Peace be still." "Peace as a river, and righteousness as the waves of the sea." What a delightful and transporting experience. How rich; how blessed. Heaven begun below. Of such it can be said: "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." And then the beautiful and luscious "fruits of the Spirit," in celestial clusters, adorn, beautify and make perfect that character: "Love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance." And, again: "For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth." It is the "tree known by its fruits," the "light on the candle-stick," the "salt that seasons with grace," the "kingdom come" with power, righteousness, peace and joy in the holy Ghost.

Now, my brother, if I am wrong please set me right. For my very inmost soul pants for this, as the pursued "hart panteth after the water-brook."

Affectionately in Christ,

From California.

MR. EDITOR: California is certainly a strange State. While Panama and Florida have suffered from frost this winter we have not. The valleys of this State are so protected by the mountains all around that we never fear frost. I have just read Bishop Kemer's letter from Mexico; we have cause of gratitude to God for our success there. The Bishop seems to enjoy the mountain scenery, and describes the scenes in beautiful language. I was very much in hopes that I, too, would be delighted out here with mountain scenery. The impression made on my mind by them is not a pleasant one. When I reached the mountains, on my way out, a kind of disgust came over me. The mountains were a conglomeration, barren, dreary, hateful to my mind. Malformations and monstrosities I never could admire. It seemed to me that the Lord had gathered all the hateful, ill-shaped parts in one pile, and then sprinkled gold dust in them to tempt man to dig for it, and, of all the temptations I know of, none that will catch a Californian quicker than this one.

Bro. Hunnicutt thinks that I am half sorry that I came to California. I would say to Bro. Hunnicutt that I have one feeling like a Bishop; they know no difference between an appointment on the Pacific coast or one in Baltimore, or any other part of our church. A Conference boundary is only for our convenience; the church is one, and why should I be half sorry at any appointment that I might receive.

It may be that I shall be appointed to a work in the Mississippi Conference in a few years; if so, it is all the same field. And I am sure I should not be half nor whole sorry that the Bishop gave me an appointment on this coast.

I would say that California is an "El Dorado," but it is all in the hands of the railroads and capitalists; hence no place for the poor people of Mississippi to come to. The lands in California sell from $[illegible] per acre. In Mississippi the poor people can own good land.

I know that it is said that a rolling stone gathers no moss, but I know also that in setting her never gets fat. The Jewish historian says that the Lord commanded the people after the flood to go out and settle colonies, but Nimrod had rather build a tower. So the Lord confounded their tongue. America would likely have been undiscovered to-day, but the "El Dorado" in the mind of Columbus was not so fabulous after all.

The missionary fire should burn in the hearts of all Christians, and they should either "go or send," and, as Bro. Hunnicutt has been sending, we will excuse him for not going. I promised many of my brethren in the Mississippi Conference and hundreds of my friends, that I would go to California, and if they could do better there than in Mississippi I would say so; but my humble judgment is they could not, and I am free to say it. I feard by this time have gotten in with some of these rich land grant owners; and sent out my circulars all over the country where I am known, and caused quite an agitation among my friends, and by so doing I likely could have filled my pocket with gold, but I should have emptied my heart of grace. There are thousands here who have been deceived this way; but I had rather die poor, with Christ in my heart, than to own a million with a guilty conscience. As to myself, I am well contented, have a good work, kind, intelligent people to preach to, never did have so many good things to eat, but I am rather a poor eater anywhere. The fact is I am having a good time every way; my congregations are good, a revival influence all over the work. We have some old-fashioned class meetings, and souls are being converted to God.

Many of our first-class preachers have come out here, and have been discouraged and returned. Doubtless they all have their reasons or excuses for so doing. As to the prospects of our church on this coast, it is about as all other churches, not very encouraging; but times are looking better than for years. Hundreds are being converted in San Francisco and Oakland, in the revival meetings of Moody and Sankey. We humbly trust the time has come that this land shall be the Lord's.

NATURE'S SONG IN THE NIGHT.

Night hath its songs. Have you never stood by the sea-side at night and heard the pebbles sing, and the waves chant God's glory? Or have you never raised from your couch, and thrown up the window of your chamber, and listened there? Listen to what Silence says now, and then a murmuring sound, which seems sweet music then. And have you fancied that you have heard the harps of God playing in heaven? Did you not conceive that your stars, that those eyes of God, looking down on you, were mouths of song that every star was singing God's glory, singing as it shone, his mighty Maker, and its lawful, well-deserved praise? Night hath its songs. We need not much poetry in our spirit to catch the song of night, and hear the spheres as they chant praises, which are heard by the heart, though they be silent to the ear—the praises of the mighty God, who bears up the pillared arch of heaven, and moves the stars in their courses.—Spurgeon.

Marriages.

BRO. ISHAM KIMBELL was born in Warren county, North Carolina, March 31, 1797, was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, under the ministry of Rev. G. Gorrell; was called to the saint's rest on his February 17, 1881.

In early life he moved with his father from North Carolina, and settled in Clarke county, Ala., where he resided until death, having lived over fourscore years. Few men have served society, church and State better, or have left to posterity a fairer record than Bro. Kimbell. For a number of years he was the Circuit Clerk, then Register in Chancery for his county. He served faithfully as long along the church as Steward. He was active in all enterprises for the church. Especially was he active in having houses of worship erected. Possessing a well balanced mind, a clear head, being upright in business, upright and generous in his dealings with mankind, he wielded a rich influence in society and State which greatness alone fosters. Truly we can say his talents, faithfulness, patriotism, consecration to God and his honored old age must place him among the distinguished men of this native State and Alabama. He married Miss Martha T. Carter, who bore him eight children. Three children and a devoted wife preceded him to Heaven. The latter died about twenty-five years ago. Three daughters and two sons survive to mourn for him. How these faithful daughters, the keepers of his home, and his devoted grandchildren, orphans, living under his care, cared for the declining years, no one but he knows. How anxiously they watched the progress of the disease which made him its victim! How tenderly, tearfully, prayerfully did they nurse him until he fell asleep in Jesus. This was the crowning beauty of his well rounded character his devotion to his Master. We do not wonder that such a Christian husband should so love his children all members of the church. On one occasion he knelt with them of the Eucharist to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. He was devoted to the ministers, especially his pastor. A room for his comfort was prepared, called the "parsonage." When he found that he would die he talked about it calmly, exhorted his children not to weep that he was going home. He is gone. And who can fill his place. The Lord only can do it. [illegible]

NANCY SMITH, nee DuBOSE, was born in Barbour county, Alabama, March 14, 1837, died at her residence, beside mine, in Choctaw county, Ala., February 11, 1881, aged forty-seven years.

While young her parents moved from Barbour county to Choctaw county, Ala., and settled near where she died. In the year 1854 she was married to Mr. G. F. Smith, who still survives, with six children, to mourn her departure, but we are confident that their sorrow and all those who have no hope. Sister Smith converted herself to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, many years ago, and ever lived faithful to her vows. She was not demonstrative in her religious professions, as some are, for she was of a timid, mild disposition, yet deep down in her heart was a peace like flowing river. In all the relations of life she could hardly be excelled, as a wife she was kind, affectionate and obedient, ever doing what she thought would contribute to his happiness as a mother and grandmother she was kind, in fact everything usually found in the Christian woman was blended in Sister Smith. We all miss her, her chair in the home circle is vacant, her pew in the church is vacant, but thanks be to him who doeth all things well, another seat in the kingdom of our Father has been filled.

She was a woman of rare industry and provided well for her own household. When the late civil strife was ended, finding that their property had been swept away by the ravages of the war, she did, as many shrink back and say the burden is too great, but with the will and courage of a hero she labored for the liberal support of her family. And by industry, economy and perseverance she, with her husband, had acquired an independent living for their children.

May her example be followed by her children in spirit as well as in temporal affairs, that a separation may not be long. We tender our sincere condolence to the bereaved family.

MRS. JANE N. GIBSON, relict of David Gibson, one of Warren county, Miss., died at the age of sixty-three years, at her home in Cross Springs, Miss.

The name of Gibson is an old citizen of Mississippi is suggestive, a name honored in the church and in the community, embracing worthy men as noble women. Honorable among them were David Gibson and his estimable wife, the subject of this notice. She was born in Jefferson county, Miss., in 1817. In her sixteenth year she was married to Mr. Gibson, who died in a short time. In her twenty-first year she was married to Mr. David Gibson, who survived her many years. To them were born seven sons and daughters. Theirs was a happy home, and blessed with a competency, formed a part of the elegant, cultured society of old Warren county, till death invaded the sacred precincts of that once happy home, a precious daughter, in school girl days, then the noble husband and father was taken. With a widowed heart and five children, three of whom preceded her to the grave, she continued her journey till her appointed time, December 21, 1880.

Since we neither live nor die to ourselves, it is not for us to moralize here. Why such secret vanishes away? Why such a family is broken up? Why such blights of early hopes? Why such pangs and sorrows to the gentle suffering heart? But in these we are at hand from God's holy word. Here we have no continuing city, no abiding place. We are as the flower of the grass, which to-day is and to-morrow is cut down. So the sufferings. Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. These light afflictions work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Sister Gibson, in early life, gave her heart to God at old Selsertown, an historical place, now non est, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church under the ministry of that apostolic man, Rev. Ransom Gibson. More than forty years she was a shining light here in good standing. The Lord has brought back to himself, to Jesus, to her husband and children and many departed friends. In the spirit of the just made perfect. May the sorrowing children and friends prepare to meet her in our Father's house.

W. T. C.

MRS. REBECCA WARREN, of Shaifer Grove, La., departed this life February 26, 1881, aged seventy-five years.

She has been a consistent member of the Methodist Church for forty years; was much loved by all who knew her; many friends and relatives visited her during her illness. She bore all her trials through life with the greatest of patience and fortitude. Her husband and several children have preceded her to the "Promise Land." She suffered greatly for three months previous to her death, but as we stood by her death-bed we seemed to hear the whispers of angels saying, "Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit eternal life."

J. S. BOYD.

LILLIE KAZIAH, faithful daughter of Samuel P. and Harriet C. Lewis, was born January 16, 1880 and died February 6, 1881.

Her parents had her dedicated to God in baptism May 10, 1880, and were going to fly to bring her to the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

FEAR NOT.

Though the dull days come again,
Though the clouds are dropping rain,
Though the winds in sighs complain,
Fear not;
For the summer shall be cheery,
And the days no longer dreary,
And thy heart less often weary,
And the sorrow all forgot.

Though the June of life be shaded,
And the first sweet flowers have faded,
And thy heart is tired and jaded,
Trust and sing;
Hawthorn hedges shall be white,
And the roses sweet and bright,
God shall make thy summer light
Believe and sing.

Though some pleasant things have fled,
Though some friends beloved are dead,
Though life's golden days have sped,
Be not sad;
Thy best pleasures yet remain,
And the dead shall rise again,
Heaven's day dawns when earth-hours wane,
Oh, be glad.

Though the difficulties throng,
And the struggle may be long,
And the powers of evil strong,
Hope on;
For to patient, brave endeavor,
Cometh utter failure never,
And the crown at last forever,
Shall be won.

Our Pulpit.

Christ Stilling the Tempest.

BY REV. JOSEPH PARKER, D. D., LONDON, ENGLAND.

And when he was entered into a ship, his disciples followed him. And behold there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves: but he was asleep. And his disciples came to him, and awoke him, saying, Lord, save us: we perish. And he saith unto them, Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm. But the men marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him? Matt. viii. 23-27.

"He was asleep." Think of the sleep of the bad man: tired with doing evil with both hands, weary in the cause of wickedness, having done his last foul trick, having worked his best energy in following that which is evil and forbidden, he falls asleep. Who can talk to him in his dreams? What images will he see in the visions of the night? Suppose he should never awake, and men should come in the morning to see how he left his work, with a foul purpose broken off, with a programme inscribed to the devil half wrought through, who would care to bury him? Would it not disgrace a horse to carry such bones to the grave? Is it not a prostitution of funeral decency to unget such a feeling?

Think of the sleep of the good man: weary in his work of noble love, hence the Spirit willing, but the flesh lying way, with the tear half dried that he was just going to cleanse utterly from there's sorrow, with the word almost broken off at the middle syllable that he was just speaking in the ear of great distress—overcome by weariness, he falls down into a deep sleep. Suppose he should never wake again, who then could tell the world's loss? Who could add up in figures the deficiency that would befall the average of the world's intelligence and piety and beneficence? When some men die, they make the world poor, they leave great gaps behind them: it is as if arms had been broken down, and ways to heaven had been shut up, and light that lighted the darkenedness of the land been put out with a rough hand suddenly. Do not account too much of the bad man's sleep, or of the good man's sleep: no argument is to be founded on the sleep of either. The murderer has slept on the night of his crime, the condemned criminal has slept on the night before his execution, the good man has lost many a night's sleep by anxieties which he could not control. We are not, therefore, to make any moral use of sleep or sleeplessness in the case of particular persons: the all men do sleep, and many may never awaken out of their slumbers, and I ask you whose sleep would you like to have: the bad man's sleep, a weariness that comes out of evil practice, the high and venturous pursuit of forbidden and disastrous prizes; or the good man's sleep, weary in his work, but not weary of it, only going down into the depths of sleep that he may come up as one refreshed, to renew with what was sweetest and noblest in his life's toil? "Let me sleep the sleep of the righteous, and may my last end be like his." So say we all. But if we would sleep well, we must work well; if we would have angels at night, we must love God during the day. If the darkness is to be jewelled by stars, then we must talk with filial love and exchange delight while the sun lasts, to make time wiser and true and altogether better. Sweet is the sleep of the loving man, blessed is the slumber of the soul that does its utmost to please God. It is pre-figurative of that rest which remaineth for those who are the servants of the Most High. Look on the bad man's sleep: 'tis as a beast getting ready for further blood. 'Tis as an axe whetting his instrument that he may commit deadlier havoc of society. Who would not pray that such strength might never be renewed? And if any man have strength to say openly, "God forbid he should ever awake again on earth," it would take much piety to keep back the "Amen" from those who heard the supplication.

We have now, therefore, to deal with the sleeping Christ. He rebuked last Sunday morning in our study that he had not where to lay his head, but the head that is weary is not particular about its pillow. He told the Scribe in our last exposition that he had not where to lay his head, and yet, in a verse or two further on, we find him asleep. If on a pillow, it was on a borrowed one. He does not contradict himself; whether he have pillow or no pillow, he must sleep. Behold him, then, in the hinder part of the ship; behold him who said he had not where to lay his head, lying down that very head on a borrowed pillow and sleeping as in the nestled in the heart of God. What occurs during his absence in sleep? "Behold there arose a great storm in the sea, insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves." A storm always arises when he is absent. His turning from us means the opportunity for a storm. We are only in peace whilst he is with us; everything depends on his nearness. It is not a merely negative condition of things which he leaves behind him—but only is the light withdrawn, but the darkness is sevenfold: not only is the wind troubled, it is troubled even to the pitch of tempest; not only does the tide roll as usual, but it comes into ineffable billows, and our little life-ship is tossed upon it as with scorn, and we are threatened with mortal danger. It has always been so in my life. A sleeping Christ will do me no good, a painted Christ will not be of effective service in my life, a wooden crucifix or even an ivory cross will not help me—it must be One wakeful Christ, with energy astir, power pouring out of him in every look and in every movement—the actual, positive, real, personal, living Christ. We are mocked by his figure—we are saved by his personality.

What did the disciples under these extraordinary and exciting circumstances? They came to him and awoke him, saying, "Lord, save us: we perish." They came to him, they did not go to one another. For a long time we may seem to be equals; we speak about the average of human strength and human intelligence; we say all men are tolerably much the same, it is a long, broad line of equality stretching over the whole human sphere, and human nature may have its ups and downs, but, as a whole, it is almost upon a level. Then there are great crises in the family when the chief man is sought out in a moment. We know him, he can not be disguised; he may be asleep, but he is the chief; he may be out of the house, but he must be sought for. I thought we were all equal? So we are, when we are all cold—when there is no immediate necessity, when there is no wolf with open mouth and gleaming teeth, and eyes of fire standing at the front door. But let a crisis supervene in the family, and the least child in the house intuitively turns its eyes in the right direction. The servant seeks the master, the weak calls for the strong, there is always a point of supremacy.

If anything should occur in your business to-morrow of an extraordinary nature you will soon find out who the principal is. If your business should proceed in the ordinary course, little or no notice will be taken of you. People will not know, perhaps, whether you are in or whether you are out; if not, how long you will be in coming in: but let any particular crisis arise in your business, and you will be missed, you will be the necessity of the hour, and there will come into your heart by the grace and presence of God the energy that will meet the hour and stamp it with conquest.

The disciples not only came to Christ, they came in the right spirit. "Lord," said they. How is it that we give the right names when we are in the right mood? How is it that we create terms to meet necessities? Suppose you had met those men on the road in a quiet hour and had said to them, "Now, cordially, who is this man you are following?" Probably their answer would have been superficial or undevout, or undefinite. Not only do they come to the right name in the right spirit, but the disciples came with the right request, saying this: observe the completeness of that word and its marvellous moral emphasis: not "Perhaps, not "Some of us in accordance rather to save the ship," but the address leads to Jonah, "Arise and take thy spire, and fall upon thy God as we have long calling upon our gods;" not "Let there be a confusion added to the distant heavens;" but "Save us: take the whole case into thy hand: we fall back and are nothing—go, thou mighty one, almighty one, to the front to save us." We cannot do without that word save. It goes around the whole compass of our necessity, it touches with a marvellous pathos all the pain of our moral distress. Jesus Christ, the Son of man, came to seek and save that which was lost. His name was called Jesus, because he should save his people from their sins. He is mighty to save: he is called the Saviour, the man with the long arms, the man with the nothing strength, whose touch is emancipation, whose look is benediction. He saved others, himself he cannot save. Thank God! If he could come down from that cross, morally, he would ruin the world. With what prayers have we come to Christ? Have we asked him to offer into conformity with us in the doing some business in life? Have we said to him that we would be pleased if he would make out what is lacking in our own strength, that we might with two-fold power address ourselves to some difficult engagement? I wonder not that the prayer lies in the air, some whore, a wasted thing, a bird with wings to weak to get beyond the third tube. We must go to him with redemptiveness, we must have nothing in our hands, we must have nothing but a great distress to hurl upon his ear, and we must use words that will show him that our self-contemplation is complete and hopeless. If you had utterest big prayers you would have died by mighty answers. If we have nibbled at the heavens I wonder not that their dignity has been offended. Let us go to Christ with nothing to recommend us, with our blindness, deafness, dumbness, our complete necessity, then we shall see how he will answer the unstopped of our helpless condition.

What answer does Christ make to these trembling disciples?

"Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith?" The quiet soul always brings quietness. You say of certain persons in your own house, when they come into the chamber of affliction, they seem to enhance and to quiet everything; their composure is so serene, their possession is so complete, that they bring with them a deliverance from the distress that was overwhelming you. See the physician in exemption, and everybody in the sick chamber goes down; see his face quiet, hear his voice unperturbed, feel his gentle, firm, subdual once everybody in the sick chamber takes heart again. The physician does not know how his face is being searched by eager eyes, and it forms to a crush in it, or a wave of suppressed feeling it is interpreted to mean disaster of the most appalling kind. The quiet soul brings quietness, the Son of Peace brings peace he created power. There is only one storm to be feared, and that is the storm of unbelief. Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith? There is only one loss to be deprecated, the loss of faith. "Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." I may lose my health, my money, my friends, my power, but if I have not lost my faith, I have lost nothing, I shall come up again. Destroy this body and in three days I will raise it again. Blessed are those whose faith is greater than the power of destruction that lies around them.

I cannot give up the miracles, because I should be giving up the great doctrine that mind is greater than matter, and without that doctrine we would be poor indeed. I hold to supremacy of mind: my belief is that the spirit is the mightiest force in creation. God is a spirit. If we had less body and more spirit, we should be quieter, mightier, wholly grander. I will not have it that the sea is mightier than mind: I would cling to the belief that there is a diviner than can command the sea and awe it into submission. The time will surely come in the process of the ages when mind shall be acknowledged to be supreme, when the good old Book that speaks what are now romances because of our coldness will be proved to be speaking words of truth and soberness. If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye would say to this mountain, "Out of the way," and it would be cast into the depths of the sea. I am not content to dwell in the townlands of the merely material and unassurable, in a kind of conscious imprisonment. I would say, with the great Pascal, to the sun, "I am greater than thou: thou couldst fall and crush me, but I should be conscious of defeat, whilst thou wouldst be unconscious of victory." Jesus gave commandment to depart unto the other side, and a storm arose. Learn that storms may arise even whilst we are in discharge of plain and divinely commanded duty. If these men had taken the ship at their own suggestion, and attempted to cross the sea for their own convenience, we should speedily have visited upon them the penalty that they were worthy of the storm which overtook them. Let us learn the brighter lesson and encourage the grander faith. Storms may arise, even in discharge of duty. Do not create your own difficulties. You are a child of God, and you have great sorrows to bear. Do not reason that if you were a child of God you would not have any sorrow—that would be sophism, not high and correct reasoning. You have a great difficulty in your business: do not reason that you have missed your providential way because you are encountering this terrible obstacle. The disciples were actually obeying Christ at the very moment the storm seized their vessel—so it may be with you. These things come, not for the deepening of your fear, but for the quickening, the enlargement and the completion of your faith. Danger will always move men to prayer—I will not guarantee that their prayers will be answered, the prayers of the wicked are an abomination unto the Lord. There are some of us who never pray but in danger—I dare not pledge that God will be present to hear. He may be his mercy enthrall forever—but if he were less than God, he would not be. Your own mother would not be: you have worn out the last filament of her love. Your own father would not be: his eyes have been cried out with tears—O foolish! If God were less than God, you would not catch him even in the bitterness of your agony. You may do so—it will be because he is God and Father. The upshot of the whole was that the men marvelled. A fair outcome, a miserable beginning, they marvelled. We are like them, we are great in wonder, we are geniuses in the matter of being open to surprise and amazement. We can do any amount of wondering. There is a wonder that is legitimate, there is a wonder that is akin to worship, there is a surprise that may lead to faith. With such surprise may we be well acquainted, but beware of the round eye and open mouth of vulgar wonder which stares at a miracle as at a show, and encourage that holy amazement which looks, then shuts its eyes, and then falls down in prayer. MISSIONARY.

Mission Room Notes of the M. E. Church: Rev. J. C. Lawson and Rev. F. La Noell, recent additions to our force in North Italy, arrived in Rome, January 29, meeting with a hearty reception from the brethren there. Rev. Marcus L. Taft is now settled in Kiukiang, Central China mission. He occupies the house where our lamented Brother Stuntmatter spent the last three years of his time in the mission. "Bro. Taft," writes the superintendent, "has visited nearly all our stations, and begins his work with wonderful zeal and discretion. Rev. V. C. Hart, our superintendent in the Central China mission, sends us late intelligence concerning the new opening at Wuchang. This is a large town, well situated for commerce, at the southwest extremity of Po-yang Lake, where two rivers discharge themselves. A great multitude of traders and others are from all this country and representatives from all parts of the province hear the gospel there, while books sold to them find their way to very distant places. Rev. B. Bagnall, a missionary of the Wesleyans, has opened this work. "Brother Bagnall," writes the superintendent, "gives a good report of Wuchang. The converts are steadfast and zealous. At his last visit he proceeded fifty miles above to the capital where he was successful. With an unmanned missionary, Brother B. may gain a permanent foothold here with little trouble. The majority of this great valley is practically unworked. The number of cities, towns and large villages on both sides of the river from Hankow to Kiukiang and up the lake into the heart of this province, are without resident missionaries, except in two or three cities. What a mighty work to be done!" The China Inland mission, we may notice in connection with the above on our work, is doing grand services through its missionaries and colporteurs who are now travelling the empire in every direction in almost perfect freedom from molestation. Five of the nine provinces recently reported as unvisited by the gospel, have been entered by them. They have made the way easier for other foreign travelers. The mission, begun in 1865, is under the direction of Mr. J. Hudson Taylor, who himself leads in the work. Some seventy male missionaries and twelves female missionaries are found in the field. They have no stated salaries, but trust themselves to divine Providence as it shall strengthen their hands. Zion's Herald.

Some Jesuit missionaries from Holland and England have had a hard time of it in the Amandebele country, south of the Zambesi, Africa. They have established their head-quarters at Gubulawayo, where Chief Lo Bengula resides. Last summer a party, led by Father Law, was sent out to explore eastward in the direction of Umzila's country, with the hope of finding footing-in that fearful. On the road the natives made some hostile demonstrations; made a prisoner of one of the Fathers, and compelled Father Law and two lay brothers, with some attendants, to abandon their wagon, and go on foot the rest of their journey, about 175 miles. The party reached Umzila's kraal safely, but they soon exhausted the king's liberality, and Father Law and Mr. Hedly were struck down with fever, in want of food. For two months they lay cooped up in a wretched hut, more dead than alive, keeping breath in their bodies with Kaffir corn. News reached their friends at Umbulawayo of their distress, and a relief party was sent out and the sufferers were succored. Mr. Wehl, who had been reported as murdered, was still alive. Umzila's country is one of the most unhealthy districts in Africa. Mr. Plukerton, of the American Board, lost his life while on the way to establish a mission; and it would seem that the people are as inhospitable as the climate.

—The Methodist Episcopal Church has done, and is doing, effective work on the Continent of Europe. It appropriates for the year 1881—for Germany and Switzland, $24,000; for Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, $13,953; for Italy, $25,000; showing a decided interest in the Continent; but it does not give a dollar to France. The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions expended in papal Europe last year $3,765.45, and has appropriated for this year the sum of $5,000. The American Board of Foreign Missions has a mission in Spain, on which it expended last year $5,710 46, and one in Austria calling $8,787 72—total, $14,497 88; but not a dollar for France.—New York Observer.

—The normal rate of increase of Christian communicants in India has been rising steadily. From 1851 to 1861 it was only 938 yearly; from 1861 to 1871 it was 2,784; while from 1873 to 1878 it has been 9,000 yearly.

—Rev. J. Harlzler, in the Evangelical Messenger, says there is to be a great assembly of the priests of the Shinto religion, to discuss the presence and successful operations of the heralds of the "Jesus religion," and to decide upon and adopt measures for the defence of Shintoism.

—Ladies connected with the Protestant Episcopal Church have started a "Twenty-minutes' Working Society," the members of which pledge themselves to work twenty minutes a day, or two hours a week, for missions, similar to one already established in England.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The commission under whose auspices collections were taken for evangelical work in France, represented by Messrs. Reveilland and Dolds, has recommended to the "American and Foreign Christian Union the enlargement and more vigorous prosecution of its work in Roman Catholic countries and requests it to devote special attention to the inviting field in France, which is now white for the harvest." Acting upon this suggestion, the directors of that society have resolved to appoint the Rev. W. W. Newell, Jr., as secretary for French evangelization, with a view to the more vigorous and systematic work which the churches of America are called upon to assist. M. Reveilland's paper, Le Signal, reports some very encouraging facts concerning the progress of the evangelization of France. We copy an illustration which some one has translated:

"The district of St. Leger le Cineretois Creuse has become entirely evangelical. The mayor, the municipal officers, teachers male and female, are all declared Protestants. In the seven villages which compose the district there are only three men who remain unbelieving. The commune has itself built a hall for Protestant worship, and this hall is filled each time Pastor Cinerat goes to St. Leger. The Roman Catholic church, on the contrary, is absolutely deserted, and it is in vain that the bishop has put up new cure there."

The fourth annual report of the Union gospel Services held in Clickering Hall, New York city, expresses the belief that the "nibble and better classes of non-church attendants are by far the most neglected by religious influences" in the cities. For the welfare of the "two hundred thousand prosperous men and women" who go to no church the services in Clickering Hall were begun, and it has been "found that a large majority of those who have attended these services are from the class named, and a very large number have each year professed conversion and become church members. The results in the year just closed have been larger than in any previous year, and the outlook for the future is more promising than ever." A list is given of churches of different denominations which have received members as a result of these services. New York Independent.

—The annual meeting of the American Tract Society was held in Washington in February. The secretary's statement shows that the receipts for the year were $382,000; expenditures, $379,000. Addresses were delivered by Justice Strong and Representative Hasbrouck, the latter giving the result of personal observation as to the usefulness of colporteurage on the frontier.

—During the time in which the Old Catholic body has existed in Europe, now ten years, it has grown, according to the Church Quarterly Review, from the fourteen men who met at Nuremberg in 1870 to protest against the latest papal innovation upon the Catholic faith, to a church consisting of two bishops, 250 priests, some 70 or 100,000 enrolled lay members, with other communities less closely attached, amounting to three times that number.

Toward the endowment fund of $500,000 called for a year ago, for the Episcopal Theological Seminary, in New York city, $418,000 has been pledged, all of which except $2,100 has been paid in. Of this sum the Hoffman family gave $75,000. The present dean, Dr. Hoffman, with his brother and sister, gave $50,000 and his father $25,000. The $50,000 is given to provide support for the dean, the present incumbent, however, being excepted from the terms of the donation.

We have given some notice from time to time of a colored organization in Virginia which is in affiliation with the Protestant Episcopal Church. It is called the Zion Union Apostolic church, and it has, according to a late report, about 10 ministers and 2,000 members. It has a bishop, or did have; but a recent announcement states that he has been deposed, and that the Rev. Wm. E. Howell has been chosen to his stead. It is thought the denomination may join the Protestant Episcopal Church in a body.

The Associate Reformed Church of Newberg, N. Y., one of the two of that denomination now left in the Northern States, has voted to connect itself with the Presbyterian body. Hymns are hereafter to be sung. The church has about one hundred and seventy-five members, and was formed during the closing years of the last century.

—The Lutherans in the United States in 1880 added 62 to their list of churches. Of the new churches, 91 are German, 35 English, and 8 German-English.

—The designation of a bishop on the "Pidgin" English of the China coast is "Number one, topside, boss pidgin man."

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, on Feb. 20, celebrated the twelfth year of his Brooklyn tabernacle pastorate.

Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, gives $1,500 to the Church Extension Society this year.

—The next General Conference of the United Brethren in Christ will be held in May next.

—The property of the church of England is appraised at £12,000,000.

CROCUS.

O the dear, delightful sound
Of the drops that to the ground
From the eaves rejoicing run
In the February sun!
Drip, drip, drip, they slide and slip
From the icicle's bright tip,
Till they melt the sullen snow
On the garden bed below.
"Bless me! what is all this drumming
Cries the crocus. "I am coming!
Pray don't knock so long and hard,
For I'm neither cross nor prompt,
But a little sleepy sprite
With the winter's lingering chill.
Never mind! 'Tis time to wake,
Through the dream at last to break"
'Twas quickly done as said,
Up she thrusts her golden head,
Looks about with radiant eyes
In a kind of shy surprise,
Tries to say in accents surly,
"Well! you called me very early,"
But she fights with such a smile
All the darksome place she fills,
Every heart begins to stir
Joyfully at sight of her.
Every creature grows more gay
Looking in her face to-day.
She is greeted, "Welcome, dear!
Fresh suffle of the hopeful year!
First bright print of Spring's light feet,
Golden crocus, welcome, Sweet!"
And she whispers, looking up
From her richly glowing cup,
At the sunny eaves so high
Overhead against the sky,
"Now I've come, O sparkling drops,
All your chattering pattering stops,
And I'm very glad I came,
And you're not the least to blame
That you hammered at the snow
Till you wakened me below
With your fine incessant tune
I'm not here a bit too soon."

A Brother's Legacy.

A telegraph messenger ran up the steps of No. — Place. As his quirk-ring the door opened, and a young lady took the message. There was but one line, yet it stood out in the morning light with terrible distinctness:

"Your brother Ralph died this morning, at 5 o'clock."

The color faded from the girl's cheek, and she leaned heavily against the door-way, gazing at the paper as if stricken dumb. The boy waited a moment, then softly touched her shoulder, saying: "Please, ma'am, there's ten cents to pay."

"Yes, I forgot," she said; then mechanically drew out her purse, paid him, and entered the house.

The boy ran down the steps, saying: "I wonder what was the matter!"

What was the matter? Only one line of writing, yet how much it meant. Ralph was dead—he, the loved and absent brother, would return no more to the hearts that missed him. Far, far away, with her he had gone to win a place for himself, with the dew of youth upon his head, he had lain him down and died.

There was a sound of great weeping in that home, for the terrible shadow of death was there.

Two weeks afterward, the bell rang again, and the expressman carried into the house a trunk marked "Ralph Gray." Kind letters had come, telling of the brother's sickness and death, telling also of his life and the honored name he had left. Pleasant words were these to the loved ones; but nothing had made his death so real as the sight of Ralph's trunk with Ralph.

Helen Gray knelt before her brother's trunk, and, with trembling hand, raised the cover. Kind hands had neatly packed the things within; and as Helen took out the folded clothes, still bearing the impress of the wearer, each garment seemed to speak his name. At last, as she opened his desk and saw a few boyish treasures within, a great wave of grief swept over her, and, with a burst of tears, she cried: "O Ralph, come back, come back!"

Then her tearful gaze rested on a worn little book, half diary and half account-book. Opening it, she saw pasted on the first page a newspaper slip containing these words:

"A worthy Quaker this wrote: 'I expect to pass through this world but once. If, therefore, there is any kindness I can show, or any good thing I can do to any fellow-being, let me do it now. Let me not defer nor neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

This, then, had been the motto for the last year of Ralph's earthly life, and the record following showed that it had not been forgotten. The expenses recorded were comparatively few for himself, but a long list of items showed how his small income had gone. There was written down: "A present for my mother;" "A present for my sister;" "A donation for the Sunday school;" "Bought flowers of poor woman;" "Books for my class;" "A Christmas present for my washerwoman;" "Fifty cents to a poor cripple," and so the generous list went on. A great number of small kindnesses, giving beautiful evidence of the noble life that Ralph Gray tried to live.

As Helen closed the little book her tears ceased to flow. Surely his young life, though brief, had not been in vain. A glow of spiritual gladness came over her face, and looking up to heaven, she exclaimed: "Dear Ralph, this is your best legacy!"

"Sorrowful, yet rejoicing," Helen Gray went on her way, holding very precious the name of Ralph, and cherishing in her heart the sacred words from his legacy:

"I expect to pass through this world but once. If, therefore, there is any kindness I can show, or any good thing I can do to any fellow-being, let me do it now. Let me not defer nor neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

Lassoing a Bear.

The following account of the lassoing of a 400 pound cinnamon bear by two well-known citizens of this county has been sent us for publication, and knowing the parties and their high standing for truth and veracity, we give it space in our paper: "George Cornell and Gus Richardson were a short time since engaged in driving a band of cattle from Gauge Wood, in Yavapai county, to Mineral Park, Mohave county, and when reaching the Muddy, a little north of Anvil Rock, they discovered a short distance ahead, crossing the road, a large cinnamon bear. Gus suggested to his companion that they amuse themselves with his lordship, the bruin. No sooner suggested than adopted. The boys dropped the cattle and prepared for their duties for sport. They made a charge upon bruin, who at first seemed a little indecident and oblivious of their presence. Cornell soon had a hitch around the neck of his bearship, when commenced a fusshi for the mastery and dilberty. Bruin caught the riata in his teeth and made an effort to sever the strands, when Gus took in the situation and lassoed the hind legs of the animal, stretching him out as long as a fence-rail. The horses which these gentlemen were riding being well trained to the work of vaqueros, assisted in holding bruin safe and sure. Their duties were now doing good service, and the next question arising was, how to get them off from the old fellow, who was groaning in pain and rage, they having left their firearms at home. A thought struck Gus. He looked his horse up, fastened the riata to the pommel of the saddle, commanded him to stand firm while he dismounted, and commenced a fusilade with rocks. The head of the bear was pretty severely bruised, the blood running profusely from his nostrils, when George recollected that he had a pocket-knife. Quicker than thought he was upon the ground, and scientifically approached the struggling bear; fetched him a lick under the short ribs, which ended the struggle, with victory for two of the best vaqueros in Arizona. Gus says the bear died game, giving a cross-eyed glance while breathing his last."

A NIMBLE BOY.—"Well! I saw a boy do something the other day that made me feel good for a week. Indeed, it makes my heart feel with tenderness and good feeling, even now as I write about it. But let me tell you what it was. As I was walking along a street of a great city, I saw an old man who seemed to be blind walking along without any one to lead him. He went very slow, feeling with his cane.

"He's walking to the highest part of the curbstone," said I to myself. "And its very high, too; I wonder if some one won't tell him and start him in the right direction?"

"Just then a boy, about fourteen years old, who was playing near the corner, left his playmates, ran up to the old man, put his hand through the man's arm, and said:

"Let me lead you across the street. By this time there were three or four others watching the boy. He not only helped him over the crossing, but led him over safely to the opposite side of the street. Then he ran back to his play! Now, this boy thought the lad only done this unkindness, while I knew that he had made three other persons, who had stopped to watch the boy, turn away with a tender smile on their faces, ready to follow the noble example he had set for them. I know I felt more gentle and forgiving toward every one for many days.

"Another one that was made happy was the boy himself. For it is impossible for us to do a kind act, or to make any one happy, without being better or happier ourselves. To be good, and to do good, is to be happy. This is every one's mission here in this world. Then again, the kind of boy I cite shows the kind of man you are going to be. If you are kind, gentle boy, your will be a generous, benevolent man.

Japanese Young Folks. There is no country in the world where there are so many toy shops, so many children's fairs, or where older people do so much for young people, as in Japan. As a general rule, Japanese children are seldom known to be punished. They are greatly petted and do not quarrel and cry so much as children in our own country, and are always good-natured, contented and happy. The children are so mischievously good, some persons say, because their parents let them do as they please; yet if they were better taken care of and better governed perhaps there would not be so many sore-eyed, sore-headed, crooked-backed children as there are.

Boys seldom play ball, but find their enjoyment in stilts, tops and kites, some of which are six feet square and very gay in appearance, and others are made to sing as they fly through the air.

Another choice game is battledore and shuttlecock. The battledore is a wooden bat, and the shuttlecock is a round seed stuck round with feathers. The boys as they play sing that the wind might blow, and the girls that it may be careless, that their shuttlecocks may fly straight. As for "Mother Goose" literature in the way of story books, lullabys and nursery rhyme, they are as plentiful as in our own land, but are characteristic of their country. In our games, for instance, of "puss want a corner" and "prisoner's base," the devil takes the place of puss or the other. Japanese children are peculiarly fond of playing "make believe," and will "pretend" to be sick and send for the doctor; "make believe" have tea parties, weddings, and even funerals. Funeral cards are very popular, and after the manner of our "old maid." Forfeits are a part of almost every game, and consist sometimes of painting the faces of the boys with ink and sticking straw to the girl's hair. Northern Christian Advocate.

CHILDREN'S MISTAKES. Children make many mistakes about Bible truth. They too often imagine that some great event must be the means of converting their souls to God, as well as of giving a direction to their future course in life.

They are prone to think that they must wait "until" some particular time arrives, when they will find everything favors their conversion.

They are equally in danger of thinking that they have it in their own power to come to terms with God when they please, so that they need not trouble themselves about it now, that another day, when they are older, will do as well for them as the day that is already throwing its shadows around them, in which to choose for themselves whether to be "the children of God," or continue the "children of the wicked one." 1 John iii, 10.

These mistakes are very dangerous. The Bible tells us now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation. 2 Corinthians vi, 2; Hebrews iii, 15.

RUSSIAN BABIES. A correspondent of the New York World, speaking of Russian babies, describes as follows what one sees in the house of a Russian peasant: He looks curiously at one old little humble ikon, on a shelf, another hung upon the wall on a peg, a third slung over one of the main beams of the roof and rocked by the mother, who has the cord looped over her foot. "Why, that is a child!" cries the traveller, with a feeling similar to that experienced on treading upon a toad which was supposed to be a stump. "Why what else should it be?" answers the mother. Having learned so much in so short a time, the inquisitive traveller wishes to inform himself about the habits of the creature in the bundle; but, his curiosity being somewhat dampened by the extreme dirt of the bundle, he inquires of the parent when it was washed. "Washed!" shrieks the horrified mother, "washed! What, wash a child! You'd kill it."

The Son of Thine Handmaid.

David, in times of great distress, recalls the character of his mother, and pleads with God the fact that she was an handmaid, or servant of the Lord. "Give thy strength unto thy servant, and save the son of thine handmaid." Himself a servant, he was also the Son of God's servant. He was not only devoted to God, and of his own choice the servant of the Most High, but his mother before him had been faithful in her allegiance to Israel's God. He thus recalls his mother, and dwells with peculiar satisfaction and comfort on her religious life. It strengthens his faith; and it encourages his trust in God, and he seems to urge it as a reason for divine deliverance. As a servant, he brings himself within the range of many gracious promises; but as the Son of God's handmaid, he seems to regard himself as entitled to the benefit of other promises, of such as are given to parental piety and faithfulness. As the sins of parents, their negligences, and their evil example, fall upon the children in many ways, so parental piety leaves an inheritance of manifold blessings to them.

He doubtless felt that, having honored his godly mother by obeying her counsel and walking in her footsteps, this might be pleaded in connection with the promise to faithful and obedient children. He might also have many precious memories of the lessons received at his mother's knees; the prayers she habitually put up for him, and of some special act or declaration in which she had dedicated her child to God. We hear often in the history of the father, Jesse, and the title, "son of Jesse," is of frequent occurrence. In one of the grand Messianic Psalms it is impressively applied: "The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended." But to the mother there is hardly an allusion, except the two which David makes, and in these she is simply described as "thine handmaid." Why should he not have pleaded the piety of his father as well, and have dwelt upon his uprightness and his character as God's servant? That he was a man of pure and righteous character we have no reason to doubt, and yet the son of Jesse is still more the son of his mother. He honors her with such mention as indicates his deepest love and reverence, and as if his own character, as the servant of the Lord, were the outgrowth of hers as the Lord's handmaid.

We gather from these references that the mother's memory was habitually cherished, and that the impress of her teachings and example was such as to leave a lasting influence, and also that her relation to God, as "thine handmaid," was to him a source of strength and hope. He had come to a throne, and had come to be possessor of great riches and power. Great and famous as he was, he refers to his mother, and counts it as his greatest honor that she was a servant of God, and that he had walked in the same path. It was something to be thankful for that he had such a mother, and the thought of her in his troubles was an inspiration to his faith and trust in God. Besides the broader field of promises which her relation to God opened to David's mind, there may have been also the remembrance of her prayers, and the feeling that the power of them still lingered at the throne, and might be as a shield to him in times of calamity. She may have been long dead, but he felt that her consecrated life and her fervent prayers were not forgotten before God. He prays as if God's strength and deliverance were somehow to reach him through her, and that, beyond his own relation to God as his servant, and beyond his own faith, hers were to be counted, and were to contribute to his welfare.

He seems to feel that his mother stood related to him and to God as the highest of any earthly priesthood. In his great trial, while he flies to God and hides himself in his pavilion, he also nestles in the bosom that pillowed his infant head. He comes to him who dwells between the cherubim for refuge and support, and yet in his coming he is emboldened by the memory of his mother's exemplary and holy life. He had not ceased to feel the power of it in his own heart, and he also felt that God had not forgotten it. Sure of being the servant of God, and claiming promises on that score, he strengthens his case, and makes his position firmer, by reference to his mother's holy and consecrated service. In this hour of conflict and of prayer the only earthly name, and the only human memory, are the name and memory of his mother. No other influence is like this in its depth and power; no other, except that of God himself, so penetrates the whole being, and survives the changes and fortunes of life.

But for these brief allusions we should have known almost nothing of David's mother; but, brief as they are, they disclose the fact that the greatness, glory and piety of her royal son were chiefly due to her as the Lord's handmaid. All this is the reiteration of a commonplace truth, and only an illustration of a mother's influence. And yet, it is an illustration drawn from a somewhat peculiar aspect of that influence, as having its highest manifestation in the cry of the soul after God.

Happy is the son who can revere his mother as the handmaid of the Lord, and who, though dead, yet speaks by the faith which she exhibited. And happy is the mother who realizes the responsibility of her position, and who, as God's handmaid, consecrates her children to Christ, and stamps them indelibly with her own pure and heavenly character. Genuine piety in the mother cannot fail to tell upon the character of the children. But it must be of such depth, and of such a type, as to command the respect and the love of the children. There are thousands of devoted mothers, unselfish, careful, affectionate, blameless in general deportment, and attentive to the ordinary needs of their children. But the impression upon their children is not that they are first and chiefly the servants of God. Their religion is not the main thing, their nearness and consecration to God do not so dominate the character and life as to make these the most memorable things in the thoughts and memories of their children. The mother's religion is apt to be that of the child. The son who has not seen it so exemplified in her as to command his respect, and his conviction of its truth and excellence, may doubt of it ever afterward. A mother's piety is about the strongest bulwark against the attacks of skepticism and the inroads of vice that a young man can have. Her character as a Christian should be so decided, so unquestioned, and so clear in its exhibition of the Christian graces, as to refute every device of the adversary of the soul. Fortunate are the children who in the hour of adversity can gain heart and hope from the recollection of a mother's piety, and who, even in their prayers, can make mention of her as "thine handmaid."

The Decline of the Churches.

The religious newspapers all over the country are discussing this subject. The latest reports from the different churches are said to exhibit the fact that the increase in membership for the last year is far below that of former years. "Many have taken in hand to set forth" the causes of this decline, and to suggest remedies to stay its progress. The opinion of one of your contributors, Mr. Editor, while it may be regarded by some as an act of temerity and by others as a thing of little value, will no doubt go for what it is worth. This is the most active age the world has ever seen. Everything changes almost every day. There is nothing that has changed more than the methods of labor. There is nothing that has increased more largely than the results of labor. The work done to-day is not done in the same manner, nor by the same means, that the same work was done a few years ago. Steam and electricity, and their appliances, have revolutionized the methods of labor, and increased its results most amazingly. What it once took ten men by hard labor to do is now done far better and with greater ease by one man. Labor-saving machines are the wonder and the delight of the age. They are the grandest instruments in the material progress of the world. It may be that the use of these things in the scientific and mechanical department of labor have had the effect to cause the church to invent some such things for use in the spiritual department. We see that everything else is moving forward at a rapid pace, and that the rapidity of progress is in proportion to the use of those means which enable one man to do the work of ten. We are thrilled with the ambition to keep the church in advance of everything, and we go to devising new means and contriving novel methods by which church work shall be done. There is no objection to this, if we keep in view the fundamental principle which underlies all effective work in the spiritual department of labor. If we ignore this principle, or if the range of our methods does not embrace it, we may construct a beautiful track, upon which the car of church progress shall thunder along, but the first we know it will be crashing down some embankment. New methods of church work are very popular at this time, and it may seem impertinent to say anything on this point; but, to the inventors of spiritual, labor-saving machines, I submit this as a fact not to be lost sight of in their calculations—the Holy Spirit, from whom comes all true church progress, can not be managed like a steam engine, nor an electrical machine, nor can souls be saved by methods invented by men. Labor-saving machines meet the ends of their invention in material things, but in the spiritual realm, while they lessen labor, they also lessen results. When by any method one man is qualified to do the work of ten, by that very method nine have nothing to do. This discards, as of no value, the rule by which the Holy Spirit operates. That rule is laid down by the Apostle Peter in these plain words: "As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another as good stewards of the manifold grace of God." Any method, then, which puts church work into the hands of a few persons, that they may "run it" for the benefit of the many, will not have the co-operating influence of the Holy Spirit. It ignores the law under which he works, and cannot achieve a permanent success. The plan which gives "every man" a place in which to exercise "the gift" he has received of God is the plan the Holy Spirit will honor by his presence and co-operate with unto success. God has ordained that "every man" in the church shall work, and he has given "every man" a qualification to do the work required of him, and there never will be the right sort of progress until "every man" shall go heartily and resolutely to his duty. A brother made a remark the other day in regard to financial plans, which is applicable here. He said: "Any plan is good if you will work it." Any plan that puts us all to "work with a will," and keeps us all at work steadily, will insure success. Temporary enthusiasm will not secure abiding results. When the public prints were full of discussions in regard to the resumption of specie payments, Horace Greeley cleared away all the difficulties by saying: "The only way to resume is to resume." So here. The only way to work successfully in the church is to work all the time. When every man of us does his duty, according to "the ability which God giveth," then these sighs over church declines will give place to shouts of gladness over church progress. The Lord never did pay a premium on laziness, and we may pray ourselves down to a whisper, yet if we do not go to work, every one of us, some one else will take our crowns. "Not every one that saith Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father in heaven."

Missionary.

At the last session of the Alabama Conference it was resolved, unanimously, that the preachers pledge a certain per cent. of their salaries "to support a missionary in the foreign field." This was a good resolution. First, Because it will move up the preachers themselves. Secondly, because the preachers, having moved up, the members will follow. But it was good also because it was the formal expression of a feeling which had been growing among us. Like the great temperance movement in the State, which seemed to come up spontaneously from the great body of the people, with very little previous special agitation by organizations and orators, and found expression in appropriate legislation; so this missionary feeling has come up in the church, without any previous special speaking or preaching. The church, or at least the preachers, have heard all the words of the commission: "Go into all the world, and preach the gospel." And the resolution went through the Conference, without a single objection. A very remarkable fact.

About two weeks ago a young friend of mine wrote me, stating that after many struggles he has solemnly consecrated himself to the foreign work, to which he feels specially called by the Holy Ghost. He sought information on all points relating to these fields, and asked my advice and my prayers. The letter thrilled me with an inexpressible pleasure, and made me think instantly of the Conference resolution, and of the connection between the consecration by the old preachers of part of their money to save the heathen and the consecration by the young preacher of the whole of his life and time to the same glorious object, the first being the inevitable prelude to the second. The letter was sent at once to one of our Bishops, to whom was given also a brief statement of the young brother's conversion, license, home and church training, literary education, etc., as these were known to me from his boyhood. He asked, very properly, that nothing personal to himself be made known to the public, and consequently I keep back his name, only giving the fact that the Conference may know God has accepted the consecration made last December, and will certainly have a man ready by that time next winter. This particular brother may be too young and inexperienced, or too feeble in health, or not sufficiently advanced in theology or in literature, or there may be others far more suitable than he. Possibly the Bishops will not accept him; we cannot say. But we may be sure of this: that some one will be ready to go on our contribution.

Until recently the missionary labors of Southern Methodism have been providentially confined almost exclusively to the millions of heathen Africans who were in our midst. The church poured out its treasures freely, and devoted its men faithfully to these souls, and accomplished a work among them and upon them hardly paralleled in the history of the past. But since this work has been completed, or so far so that the negroes are no longer the proper subjects of our special missionary labor, God now, as never hitherto, is everywhere opening the hearts of young men to the cry of other lands to "come over and help." Our Bishops are on the watch; their eyes are over all the church, and we may be certain they will be ready with the man by the time we are ready with the money.

Another matter: We have twenty men within our own bounds doing domestic missionary work. To them we promised certain amounts, and that we would take our collections before the month of May, and send the money forthwith to Bro. J. M. Patton, the treasurer. The object was to pay them as they might need it. They will, doubtless, need it before May, the time it is due. The winter has been unusually hard, and expenses unusually heavy. They have made no complaints, yet we know they need it. Their stewards are the board of managers, and all their preachers are their collectors. Let us, as their stewards and collectors, be as faithful and prompt with them as we wish our stewards and collectors to be with us.

An Untrustworthy Witness.

The following, from the pen of Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the New York Christian Advocate, is by no means complimentary to our confrere, the Rev. Erastus Q. Fuller, D. D., of the Atlanta Advocate. We have been of that same mind in this latitude for some years, but have heretofore failed to impress the fact upon our brethren North.

The only editor in the church, or in the country, who imputed selfish motives to Mr. Seney, in his gifts to Emory College, was Dr. Fuller, of the Atlanta Advocate. He has had the opportunity to make the amende honorable, but he has not done so. On the contrary, he has made accusations and perversions equally untrue against us. We regret the exhibition of this spirit, both for his sake and that of the cause which he represents. Without intending to imply a conscious want of integrity on his part, it is painful to us to be forced to the conclusion which others, before this time, have affirmed but we have denied, that, when his passions and prejudices are involved, his statements are untrustworthy.

Yes, it has been "affirmed," and then vigorously "denied." But now the conclusion is "forced," though painful, "that, when his passions and prejudices are involved, his statements are untrustworthy." We are heartily glad that after these weary, painful years of misrepresentation the light is breaking, and the truth is revealed. Abuse has been heaped upon us, and "untrustworthy" witnesses have testified against us, but we have waited in patience for the hour of inexorable justice. Last year Dr. Fuller published his famous "chapter of horrors," which served the purpose of intensifying prejudice against our section. The South was charged with horrid brutality in persecuting every friend of the colored race. What shocking details were recited! telling of preachers and teachers slaughtered and intimidated, whose only offense was their Christian devotion to the moral and spiritual elevation of the negro. Bishops and editors in the North accepted these statements as true, and thrilled many a congregation and anniversary occasion with the story of their glorious martyrdom. It was declared then, and we repeat now, that no preacher, in discharging the duties of his office, and because of his gospel labors, has ever been persecuted in the South. When men have forgotten the preacher in the politician, and become partisan leaders, these things, and to say, may have occurred. The "passions and prejudices" of party politics often outrage moral decency and social order, but such wrangles and butcheries should not be charged to a heathen fiendishness against the gospel and its noble ministry. So far as our observation extends, no people more reverence and regard the pure gospel minister, of whatever creed or color, than those of the South. It is both instinctive and traditional. Without the slightest spirit of rejoicing at this painful attitude of Dr. Fuller, we ask our brethren, would it not be well to revise some other "statements" of his about our people made in the past ten or twelve years? If, "when his passions and prejudices are involved, his statements are untrustworthy," is it not very probable that he has been under such a spell for these years? Was it not the same spirit that provoked his attack on Mr. Seney and Dr. Haygood?

"Untrustworthy" witnesses have been the grief and shame of our Methodisms. They have occasioned bitterness and contention, when fraternity and co-operation should have prevailed. Let them depart, or cease to be trusted, and we shall have peace. But what a horror of horrors, that the author of the "chapter of horrors," should be published as an "untrustworthy" and horrible witness.

Running With Hot Boxes.

This phrase was used by a railroad man of another who was falling into vicious habits. It seemed to me so apposite that I could not shake off the nervous sensation produced by the announcement, by the brakesman of a train, "hot boxes." It was not a simple, but a very complex idea. I did not see in imagination a locomotive alone, but a train; not an empty train, but one loaded with freight or passengers; not stationary, but in rapid motion; not, however, moving smoothly or safely, but roughly and dangerously rushing to ruin; not to ruin by itself, but carrying the whole train with it, and tearing up the track, so as to endanger or stop other trains. Pictures of horror rose along with the noisome stench of the hot boxes. Thundering crash and piercing shriek, mingling in the midnight air, far out of reach of help, a plunge perhaps from an Ashtabula or Tay bridge, or at least wreck, indescribable horror and death. After that hurrying messengers, telegrams, trains of relief, clogging of freights, delays, disappointments, bankruptcies, and almost unimaginable evils springing up far down the future and repeating the cry, "hot boxes." These were some of the thoughts suggested as the words fell upon my ear.

Another incident in my traveling experience was also recalled. Upon one occasion in the night I was awakened from my dozing by an unusual rattle and increased jostling and jumping of the train. There were not many passengers in the car, and near me was sitting the conductor, one of the train men, his lantern upon the floor, and his head out of the car window. After some moments he drew his head in, and I remarked: "We are making about forty-five miles an hour, are we not?" "No," he replied, "we are going slow; but the road is rough, and we've hot boxes." So I concluded that the man who was running with hot boxes might think he was making time speed because he was making much noise and jostle. Noise and jostle are not the necessary concomitants of speed. They are rather the evidences of obstructions, friction, resistance, ill fitted machinery and the like. The cloud speeds on at the rate of fifty miles an hour, yet its course through heaven is as noiseless as the settling of the dew upon the flower. The electricity speeds along the wire with almost instantaneous flash, yet its noise is not as great as the tread of a fly. How many a man would stop if he could but realize that the noise and stir in the world where he goes are but the result of "running with hot boxes," and not the real effect of helping either himself or the world on to the goal of happiness or glory. He has descended from the altitude of the clouds, and is skurrying along through brambles, hedgerows and brush. He is like the water quitting the steady and rapid flow of the unobstructed channel, to whirl and eddy and gather foam and trash behind some rock or bar near the shore. But many run with hot boxes, thinking to economize time or something else. To such put the question: Which is the cheaper, the loss of an hour or the possible destruction of the train?" But many are the urgent calls to sacrifice for the good of the world is the reply. I would answer that the heading rush into death is not sacrifice. Worry has no merit in it. Overwork or friction have none of the qualities of martyrdom in them per se. The rush and strain upon one's intellect or physical powers, which produce exhaustion, do not entitle him to the c[illegible] of martyrdom. There will come a time when it will be considered [illegible] vicious to overload the mind as to overload the stomach. Temperance in all things should be applied to mental intellectual and moral indulgence as well as his physical. It is indeed a bewitching kind of intemperance to have the imagination kindled and the tissues of the brain intensely excited, or to feel the aesthetic emotion of the emotional nature, but these tremendous forces should not be allowed too much play. To run with hot boxes morally soon results in lunacy or imbecility; intellectual strain long continued impairs mind and body.

A few days ago I read a paragraph relative to Mr. Spurgeon. A man of tremendous force says all the Christian world; but why should he succumb when he should have great vigor? He has done a grand work, but it would have been grander if he diminished his labors by a third, so that he might have lengthened the period of active labor by fifths. But "hot boxes" was [illegible] several years ago, and on the road has sped until there is now little hope of much more. Charles Dickens was another notable example of great intellectual activity and power. He taxed these powers until nature complained. Then, instead of the stimulant of rest, he took to the stimulant brandy, and, all at once, down came, before he or the world knew that the danger was nigh. Moses once was near this same disease, hot boxes, but he took the advice of his father-in-law, and forty years later, with eye undimmed and natural force unabated, he stood on Nebo, and from its bold crest bade adieu to the world.

Again I thought of the [illegible] mann's expression as applicable in many respects to the age in which we live. "Whither dost thou run?" sang a poet of his country two thousand years ago. It was an age of intense activity. There never were grander intellects produced or more heroism displayed, but the poet felt that his people were running. The world, after its agonies and its exploits, fell into a torpor, and the centuries of medieval unthrift was the penalty of "hot boxes." The Roman empire. Our age is endeavoring to anticipate everything. We do not want the next generation to have anything to do in the way of achievement. The young are in such a hurry to engage in the contest that they can not wait for them to get an education before the start; no, all may be over before they are there. Cry out "hot boxes," but no one heeds. Only the echo of the yell of the mad crew as they pile on wood and turn on the steam. We may leave posterity nothing to achieve, but if the past warrants prediction as to the future, the next generation will have abundant opportunities to make an oath roadway, rolling stock, which might have been avoided had we not "run with hot boxes."

To the Members of the Alabama Conference.

OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

BRETHREN: Allow me to inform you that the following resolution was unanimously adopted at our session at Pensacola:

Resolved, That the collection for domestic missions be taken up in the month of May, and the money forthwith transmitted to the treasurer of the Board of Missions.

Every member of the Conference will readily see the reason and the propriety of this action. The missionaries, like the other preachers, need money along during the year, and this was for their relief. The resolution was passed.

For many years, as most of you know, our treasurer labored under embarrassments, owing to inadequate appropriations by the Mobile and Montgomery Conferences, at a time when the church was barely able to meet the necessary expenses of our regular pastors. Happily, by the devoted attention the preachers gave to the matter of collections, and the blessings of God, our debts have all been paid, and for two years we have had a surplus. Last year we were able to pay twenty per cent. in advance on the drafts given the missionaries, and at Pensacola the treasurer was directed to pay twenty-five per cent., a quarter's allowance, which he would still have a large balance on hand. You will be glad to see the encouragement and know this gives our brethren who work these hard fields.

The board very much desire to meet the drafts quarterly. Some will say this is not right, nor just. But to do this we must have early collections, and the money must be in the hands of the treasurer.

Now, brethren, will you give heed to this matter at once? Pardon me for being urgent. Please [illegible] mind that the appropriation in no case has been excessive. On the contrary, many of them are meager, very meager, considering the work to be done, and the necessarily heavy expenses of many of our brethren engaged on missions.

Most gladly would the board have been more liberal in the amounts allowed had the way been clear to do so.

The present wish and purpose of the board is to increase the collections until a sufficient amount is on hand at the beginning of the year to pay in full the appropriations, and, if we succeed, the drafts will be paid quarterly in advance. The advantage and relief this will afford our mission work must be apparent to every one. I have information which leads me to believe that some of our missionaries are just now in need of assistance. One has lost his horse, and, unless helped by the prompt payment of his draft, will be unable to perform the work on his extensive mission.

The question may be asked: Will this call for money by the domestic board never cease? Will the missions never become self-supporting in this Christian land? We hope so. We confidently look forward to the time, in the near future, when home missions, so far as the Alabama Conference is concerned, will be matters of the past, and when our people can turn their attention exclusively to the cultivation of the foreign field. With the increase of population in sparsely settled districts, and the establishment of new centers of trade and education, it is reasonable to expect that the church will be self-sustaining where now the gospel is preached only by outside help.

Many of our former missions are now flourishing circuits and stations. Notably among these is Pensacola, which so handsomely entertained the Conference at the last session. From nothing it was built up by the missionary society of the old Alabama Conference to a self-supporting station, with a good church and parsonage. But when the first preacher, sent there by the Montgomery Conference after the war, reached his appointment he found nothing but ashes where the church and parsonage stood, and but four members. War had done its work. Making liberal appropriations, amounting some years to $500, the mission board fostered and encouraged the work until Pensacola is rapidly rising into the dimensions of a first-class station. She now has a neat, substantial church, and a comfortable parsonage free of encumbrance, and she paid her pastor last year $1,000, and the presiding elder $150, besides meeting the assessments ordered by the Conference. I mention this to show that our domestic mission work is not without visible fruit. The invisible fruit we must wait for the revelations of the last day to declare.

But I presume enough has been said by way of reminder. If each preacher will do what he can in this collection, many of the hard features of the missionary work in our Conference will be removed.

Prohibition in Kansas.

The following, from the Raleigh Christian Advocate, corrects a mistake which has been widely circulated in regard to the Prohibitory law of Kansas. The Governor and the Attorney-General of Kansas both declare that the law does not prohibit the use of wine at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. We are very glad of this. To prohibit wine for sacramental purposes would be likely to defeat the law. The enemies of the law, and of prohibition, doubtless started the report:

Not very long ago the News and Observer, of this city, published an editorial giving a doleful account of the workings of prohibition in Kansas, representing that there was great dissatisfaction in Kansas, that some of the preachers even would resist the law because it prohibited the use of wine at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, etc. Now that editorial, whether so intended or not, was calculated to do the cause of prohibition harm in this State, and that we might speak according to authority, we enclosed that editorial to the Governor of Kansas and asked him if the facts stated in it were true, and below we give his reply to our letter of inquiry:

LETTER FROM GOV. ST. JOHN.

State of Kansas, Executive Department.
Topeka, March 13, 1881.

Messrs. Black & Reid, No. 15 Fayetteville street, Raleigh, N. C.:

Gentlemen: Your letter of the twenty-fifth instant, enclosing editorial clipped from the News and Observer in relation to prohibition in Kansas, has just been received. The reference to Dr. Beatty does that gentleman a very great injustice and I regret to know that garbled extracts from his address are being published throughout the country in the interest of free whisky.

What is known as the Kansas Temperance Prohibitory Law, in no manner interferes with the sale of any mixture or compound used solely for medicinal purposes, nor does the law prohibit the manufacture of perfumery that is not used as a beverage; nor does it directly or indirectly prohibit the use of wine in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and all reports to the contrary are instigated and circulated by the whisky ring to try and break the force of the law recently enacted in this State, which bids fair to become an entering wedge to open the way to absolute prohibition throughout the entire land, of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage.

Notwithstanding our law does not take effect until the first day of May next, the wisdom of the policy of prohibition in Kansas is already visible in the closing of the saloons in nearly all of the interior towns of the State, and after the first day of May we shall not have an open bar in Kansas; our people have determined never again to be guilty of giving the sanction of law to a great evil.

Very truly yours,

JOHN P. ST. JOHN.

The Governor also sent us a copy of "The Kansas Liquor Law" and the opinion of the Attorney General, which corresponds with his statement above.

We thank Gov. St. John for his prompt and manly response and now, if the News and Observer really wants to do "the fair thing," it will devote at least as much space to the correction of the false impressions made by the editorial referred to, as it did to the dissemination of the misrepresentations set afloat by the whisky men, who do not scruple to publish the grossest falsehoods that they may defeat prohibition. We do hope that the secular papers of our State will not lend their columns to the circulation of the misrepresentations by men who are interested in the whisky business.

Burial of Rev. W. H. Watkins, D. D.

Mr. Editor: It will be remembered that the remains of the late Rev. W. H. Watkins, D. D., were placed in a vault in the city of Jackson, Miss., on the sixth of February last with the expectation of removing the same as soon as the weather would permit to this Jefferson county, for final interment. Yesterday being the day set apart for this solemn duty a large audience was brought together at Cane Ridge Church to witness the services.

Nearly a half century ago, the above church sent up the name of W. H. Watkins to the quarterly Conference for license to preach. The original house then stood but a short distance from the present building. Hence the name is a familiar one throughout this county. Many of the older citizens here have watched with great interest the progress of him whom they claim as a native of this county.

Rev. C. K. Marshall, D. D., of Vicksburg, came down with the remains to conduct the funeral services. He gave us an appropriate discourse, closing the same with a sublime eulogy on the life and character of the deceased, after which Brother J. H. Jones, made some remarks in which he gave us the time and place of the Doctor's conversion; also spoke of the high esteem in which he was held by his brethren of the Mississippi Conference. Bro. J. A. B. Jones, was also present and took part in the solemn exercises. When the rites of the church had been performed the "Masonic Fraternity" took charge, and with their impressive ceremony consigned the body to the grave. Sister Watkins and three of the children were present, surrounded by a host of relatives and friends. God be praised for such a life, and such a death.

D. P. BRADFORD.

Fayette, Miss., April 7, 1881.

Prohibition has gained ground, but it has met with temporary defeat in some of the States. The friends of prohibition must organize and persevere. The whisky power will be shaken and overthrown after awhile. The Texas Christian Advocate says:

Prohibition failed in the lower house at Austin by a vote of fifty for to thirty-three against it. Liquor men are jubilant, and many friends of the measure are sorely disappointed; A calm survey of the situation, however, will afford the whisky ring slight cause for congratulation. A few such victories as this will insure the overwhelming defeat of the saloons. Few, even of the most sanguine, anticipated a few months ago an uprising for prohibition so widespread and determined as the petitions with which the legislature has been flooded have displayed. This was not the result of an organized movement, but was a spontaneous outburst of the moral sentiment of the best citizens of the State. The first demand, ever made in Texas, for the total suppression of the liquor traffic was sustained in the Senate by a two thirds vote and in the lower house by a very decided majority. If, without organization, the temperance sentiment in Texas has developed such strength that it could carry its measures to the very verge of success, it does not require a prophet's vision to discern the result when the temperance sentiment shall crystallize into an organized movement, and the friends of law and order shall meet with solid front the combined forces of the liquor interest, which so long have dominated in primary meetings, dictated terms to nominating conventions and wielded a potential influence in legislative halls. When conventions apprehend the fact that no party whip can compel freemen to vote for candidates who aid in fastening this cause of crime upon society, they will promptly adjust their action to the demands of an awakened public sentiment, and men will be chosen for office who will represent the will of the people.

Motives and Conditions.

Mr. Editor: Dr. Curry did not know of Mr. Seney's gifts till he saw the announcements in the papers. Mr. Seney said nothing to me of "conditions." He said this: "I have made up my mind to give $100,000 to help the cause of education in the South. I wish to concentrate what I give in such a way as I think will do the most good. So, after inquiry and thinking it all over, I will raise my contributions to Emory College to $70,000. I will also give $50,000 to Wesleyan Female College."

Yours, Atticus G. Haygood.

Emory College, Oxford, Ga., April 9, 1881.

—The New Orleans District Conference met at the Louisiana Avenue Church, in this city, on Thursday, April 7, and adjourned Saturday night, April 9. The churches, for the most part, were reported to be in a fairly prosperous condition. Bishop Keener presided, and in his kind but searching way brought out what needed to be known and discussed. It was a Conference, without committees, and without much formality in the proceedings. The brethren conferred, talked, counseled, and, withal, prayed together. Strange to say the circulation of the Advocate has been greatly neglected in the city of New Orleans, and in the bounds of the District. Some of the pastors declared their purpose to attend to this interest in their pastoral work, and to bring it publicly before their congregations. We hope they will. Resolutions were passed promising pastoral vigilance in regard to such violations of the discipline as the use of wine and intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and dancing and theatre going. There was preaching at 12 o'clock each day. The Seashore Camp Ground Trustees elected are: W. H. Foster, Philip Hallaran, R. O. L. Rayne, S. K. Russ, Dr. J. J. Lyons, B. D. Wood, G. W. W. Goodwyn, John H. Keller.

Delegates to the Annual Conference: W. H. Foster, A. E. Read, R. O. L. Rayne, Rev. T. J. Carver. Reserves: W. H. N. Magruder, T. W. Dyer.

The next District Conference is to meet at Baton Rouge.

—The Pastor's Visit is the title of a small sheet published at Baton Rouge, for the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in that city. We suppose, of course, that Bro. J. T. Dayes, the energetic pastor, is editor and publisher. Its design is to aid in local church work, and especially to help in the line of pastoral labor. It is to be published weekly, at $1 per annum.

—The residence of Prof. DuPre, of Wofford College, South Carolina, was recently burned. The house was a valuable property belonging to the College. It was not insured.

—Mr. George I. Seney has raised his gift to Emory College to $50,000, and he has also given $50,000 to the Wesleyan Female College, Macon, Georgia.

—Rev. G. W. Boyts, of the North Mississippi Conference, wishes us to say that his address is Como, Panola county, Mississippi.

—The Southern Christian Advocate, of April 9, says: "Bishop Wightman is improving very slowly if at all."

Rev. R. S. Ishell is doing finely on his work. Writing from Floyd, La., April 8, he says: "The Advocate, my dear brother, is not forgotten. I call the attention of my people to the Advocate, both publicly and in my pastoral visitations. The result is I succeed in getting some subscribers, as perhaps you have learned through your publisher, Bro. Lathrop. I think I will succeed in getting several others. My dear brother, all of our church interests are now prospering 'in the seconds of the earth.' When I came here I went to God in prayer, and asked his blessing and guidance. Called a church meeting, and explained matters. Told them the Discipline would be enforced if it took every name from the church record. That a church, living as it was, brought reproach upon all concerned. That there must be a distinction between the church and the world, etc. I got them to thinking; spoke firmly, but affectionately. All went to prayer. Going to bails by the membership is now completely broken up. Have now large congregations all the time, and, my brother, in a word, one of the most gratifying changes, in every respect, I ever witnessed. My poor heart is filled with gratitude to God. A good Sunday-school under way, and one of the most interesting class meetings I ever attended. The class meeting interest is continually increasing. We worshiped on my arrival in an old house, but little better than an old barn, all or nearly all of the glass out of the sashes, and several of the sashes broken. Have purchased glass, and put them in all of the windows, and put up new blinds. Have purchased in New Orleans a fine lot of cypress lumber, to furnish our church with pews, and will soon send for a chandelier. Am at work from time to time on our parsonage and grounds attached, and after a little while it will be the most desirable and attractive place in town. My dear brother, the present outlook is so much better than it was when I came here I had to unburden myself to some one, and who more deserving than you. Best of all, the entire church is aroused on the subject of religion, and many penitents at the altar for prayer. On the eve of a glorious revival."

Rev. W. S. Lagrone, writing from French Camp circuit, North Mississippi Conference, April 5, says: "The spiritual outlook is not so good. There are some of the pure and good, but there are some of the biggest sinners, possessed of the devil and whisky. They must be a kin. We are at work for prohibition. A meeting was held a few nights ago, in one of the worst whisky holes for its size I ever saw. They came from all quarters, in their glory and prime. I did not suppose that Adam in the garden, when he stepped out to name, had a greater variety of sounds than we had there. Really one would have thought the quadruped and feathered tribes had gathered to amuse us. One fellow grunted me out of a speech completely, but, in spite of all, we started with a respectable number of good workers."

Rev. Thomas Y. Armstrong, writing from Chunky Station, Shady Grove mission, Mississippi Conference, April 5, says: "Our first quarterly meeting was to have been held March 19 and 20, but, owing to the abundance of rain, we had no Conference. The presiding elder could not get there. No members. I preached three times to small congregations. I have been hindered this year more than in all my life; high waters, cold or sickness of self. The mission is doing about as well as it can under the circumstances. So cold and wet the farmers are very much behind, many are plowing up and planting over. Some sickness, though the health is generally good. This is the finest timbered section of country I ever saw, the grandest pine forest in the world."

Another Correction.—The Women's Missionary Society, of Shreveport, ought to be credited with $100 instead of $5, as in the printed minutes. Please let this note appear in your columns in the interest of all concerned.

Joel T. Davis.

Baton Rouge, La., March 1, 1881.

A Sad Return.—The sudden and severe affliction, says the Nashville Christian Advocate, of April 9, of Mrs. McLain, our young missionary to China, necessitated her return to the United States. The peculiarly distressing nature of her malady was such, that it was found necessary for Dr. W. R. Lambuth to accompany Brother and Sister McLain, on this sad homeward journey. The three reached Nashville on Friday evening, of last week, and left next morning for Atlanta.

Says the Southern Crusader: In Texas, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri, North and South Carolina, and indeed, in every State North, South, East and West, there are organized movements against the liquor traffic. In a few years it will be under the ban of public opinion everywhere.

Let the friends of reform stand firm everywhere. The army is growing in numbers and power every day. Reader, go to work in your section, buckle on your armor, take your place in the ranks, and fight for all that is dear to you, your country, your State, your county, and your own home and dear ones.

The Annual Meetings.—The annual meeting of the Bishops at Nashville, will take place on the first Monday in May. The annual meeting of the Board of Missions, will take place on the first Wednesday in May.

The week of prayer was observed in Jerusalem this year, the Anglican Bishop taking charge of the services.

STEWED OYSTERS.

Friend am I, and not foe, and yet men heard me,
And boil my beard in my own juice with gravy;
Strain off my beard, and put me in basted,
Thicken the mess with flour and ounce of butter,
Kill my ambrosial flavor with their ketchup
White wine, anchovy, lemon, whatyou will,
Nutmeg, and salt and pepper, mace and cream,
Simmer, and serve me hot on toasted sippets.
They will not let me boil, but my blood boils
At thought of how, while they would paint the lily,
Pepsine and piquant crudeness both must perish.

The nervous mother of a bright little boy was alarmed lest he should take the whooping-cough, which prevailed in the neighborhood. She talked so much about it and worried so over it that, she gave the child her fears to such an extent that he would scarcely leave her side. One night, after the little fellow had been put to bed and asleep, a bad key was driven past the house, and when just opposite set up his hee-haw. Without a chick the little fellow was out of bed, roaming at the top of his voice: "The whooping-cough is coming, mamma! the whooping-cough is coming!"

An American arrived one day at a little hotel in a French provincial town. Tired and dusty with travel, he demanded a room and plenty of water to wash with. "Water! we have none a drop," said the landlord. Muttering expressions of dissatisfaction, he reached his room. "Fire, fire, fire." A dozen servants rushed up stairs, and into his room bearing in their hands vessels of all sorts, filled with water with which to extinguish the flames. "Ah," said the guest, turning composedly upon them, "you may leave me the water. Thank you, that's all."

A German organist, having lost the key to his instrument, could not play. He put his head over the gallery and thus addressed the minister, who had just finished the reading of a hymn: "Mister preecher, Mister preecher! We vont have no singing this afternoon. De key not comed, and de laty vat stays de solmado bees not comed, and de rest of de peebles vat sings he not comed, and de organ bees not obeyed, and we vont have no singing dis afternoon, mister preecher. That's so."

The hotel boy had been instructed, when he knocks at Dean Stanley's door, and heard the inquiry, "Who's there?" to reply, "The boy, my lord." The boy answered the first call with considerable trepidation, and surprised the dean by a loud response to his question: "The lord, my boy!"

"You politicians are queer people," said an old business man to an impecunious partisan. "How so?" asked the politician. "Why, because you trouble yourselves so much more about the payments of the debts of the State than you do about your own."

Beneficent nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Duplice's Indian Turnip Pectoral Balm is made of no herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

Mr. ——, the writer who was lately prosecuted for libel, was asked why he had not read the passage in question. "Am I expected to read everything?" he cried; "if I kept a druggist's shop should I have to take all the medicine myself?"

"Will you have it rare, or well done?" said Commissioner Brennan to an Irishman, as he was cutting a slice of roast beef. "I take it well done ever since I came to this country," replied Pat, "for it was rare enough I ate it in Ireland."

"Oh! Mistor," said an old lady after a bicycle had passed her, "just now I seed a wagon wheel runnin' away with a young man. You kin believe it or not. I wouldn't if I hadn't seed it myself."

GRAFTING.—I believe all animal fats and oils to be unhealthy applications to vegetable growths. Therefore, I question, upon that principle, the propriety of employing either lard or tallow as an ingredient of grafting wax. Indeed, I have remarked that when I formerly used such wax, the bark would frequently die away from the end of the stump and sides of the cleft, in quite healthy young wood—an accident that rarely happens when the wax is compounded with innocent materials. I always prefer making my own grafting wax to buying it, as I know it to be of the best materials, and after a good many years' experience, I have settled down upon the following composition as combining all the necessary qualities of a good grafting wax: Take of linseed oil one pint, clear resin six pounds, pure beeswax one pound; melt together slowly, so as not to burn, and stir thoroughly together; pour into a pail of cold water, and when cool enough work white like molasses candy. Make up into rolls six inches long and lay up on a beam in a cool cellar. It will keep there perfectly good for many years. When taken out into the garden in a mild day, it will soon be soft enough to handle easily. If the hands are rubbed with a little linseed oil occasionally, the wax will not be troublesome to them. Grafting on a pleasant spring day, and when one is not forced to hurry, is a very agreeable occupation, and unless the wind chops round into the east and stiffens up the wax, by no means a fatiguing one. A few simple rules, if properly kept in mind, will favor success. Use a fine saw for cutting the stump, and pare the edges smooth with a sharp knife, before making the cleft, which should always be oblique to the horizon. If perpendicular the scions will often fall out after growing rapidly, for lack of support. If horizontal, the young limbs will split off one-half the branch as soon as they begin to bear; on upright limbs of course it makes little difference. Cut the scions from the vigorous old limbs, where the new wood was short. Never use suckers or long tapering shoots, unless absolutely necessary. If there are plenty of scions, use only the terminal buds, as they start most readily. Leave only two or three buds above the cleft, as long scions often blow out. After shaping the scions keep the thin ends in the mouth so that they shall not dry before inserting; color each graft carefully, end and sides, with wax, before beginning on another. Leave no hole for air or water to penetrate, however small, and wind a strip of cotton cloth over every part of the wax, that the heat sun in May and June shall not melt it away before the bark has united. It is well to set the scions slightly diverging from each other, so that the bark of the scion and the bark of the cleft will cross each other at long angles, and develop points of union. In grafting over a large tree it is well to do the top first, leaving the lower limbs to take it easy, thereby not forcing the new growth inordinately. After the top is well grown, finish up the base of the tree, a limb or two each year.—New England Farmer.

THE CULTURE OF THE ORANGE.—The interest in orange culture is increasing every year and many persons are contemplating purchasing land and putting out orange groves. The recent cold spell which struck Florida furnishes a valuable guide to persons who think of locating in that beautiful State. We now have definite advices from there, and it appears that at Jacksonville the oranges were frozen on the trees; at several places they were greatly injured, but we observe that at Ile Land, Orange City, and the vicinity no orange, lemon or lime trees were injured, nor was the fruit on the trees the least damaged. The guavas were a little scorched, and likewise the bananas, but the staple fruits were all right. This is the section of Florida which we have commended to the favorable notice of prospective settlers of that State. The proximity of the St. John's River, the character of the soil, the immunity from frost and the healthfulness of the climate as well as the excellence of the drinking water speak volumes in its favor. Several Louisville people have settled in that quarter, and they speak in glowing terms of their prospects. The region is rapidly filling up with a desirable class of people, and it will emphatically be the garden spot of the State. There are lands in the neighborhood of Orange City, Spring Garden, De Land Borestord, which offer every condition of successful orange growing, and we do parties who meditate going to Florida a kindly act by inviting their attention to this section. They will save a great deal of money by going directly there, and not wandering vaguely all over the State. A stranger in Florida may settle in a very unhealthy spot; he may locate on land unfit for fruit culture; he may settle too far from the frost line, or he may get too far from transportation. The section of the State which we recommend fulfils all the conditions of soil, climate, frost exemption and nearness to market, good schools, and post offices, churches, stores, physicians and good society are now found there, and a region which a few years ago was an almost unbroken pine forest, is now being converted into orange groves with handsome cottage residences everywhere visible, a pleasant and beautiful picture.—Louisville Commercial.

ENSILAGE.—This subject is now exciting much interest among American farmers; especially in the Eastern States. There is no question that green corn stalks, and other fodders, can be kept in silos, and that they are eaten with avidity by farm stock, when removed in the green state in mid winter. It is established that the ensilaging of fodder is practicable when it is desirable to get the greatest number of tons of food from the smallest area of land. Stock feeding is a system of intensive farming calls for some such method of preserving fodder. Many important points in ensilaging remain to be settled, and we caution me and all, to not adopt the method largely until the whole ground has been thoroughly canvassed. Those who have built silos and are now feeding their contents are enthusiastic, but many of their statements are unintentionally colored by their ardor. The item of cost is frequently distorted, and the statement of tons produced per acre is faulty. The superior value of the green fodder over the dry, of the same kind, is not so thoroughly established by exact experiments as is desirable. The great need at present is a cheap form of silo for a few tons of fodder, easy of access, and suited to keep one cow. We enjoyed a recent conversation on this subject with a leading Connecticut farmer who had the cranberry fever a few years ago, and lost $30,000 by it. He said, "I am willing to look into this ensilage on the most thorough manner, and shall adopt it as soon as I see it is safe and profitable." It is well for all to take the same course.—American Agriculturist.

ON SETTING HENS.—The Prairie Farmer puts it down to numbers as follows: 1. Never set a hen in a box above the ground or floor of the chicken house if possible, as the eggs dry too fast and lose their vitality. If possible, to set the better success.

2. Never set more than fifteen eggs, no matter how large the hen. Some set only ten or twelve, but under ordinary fowls thirteen or fifteen will hatch as readily as a less number—though more are a waste.

3. Always be careful to mark the eggs set with the date of setting, as other hens often lay on the same nest with a setting hen, and when the brood is ready to come off, extra unhatched eggs are left in the nest which you cannot account for, and do not know how to dispose of, except by waste, not knowing when they were laid.

4. Keep a memoranda of all hens set, with dates when they should come off, that you may have coops and proper food prepared for them. Also take the young chicks from the hen as they dry, because sometimes they may run over their time a little, or hatch earlier.

5. Better let hens come off their nests for a short time for food and water, than to confine and feed on the nest.

Two boards nailed together at one end, with slats or lath across in the form of an A, make an excellent coop.

VALUABLE INFORMATION.—The editor of the Southern Live Stock Journal says it is the popular rage with religious papers, now-a-days, to publish "Agricultural Departments," and so far as he is able to judge, the matter contained in said "Agricultural Departments" does not please himself all times. He says one of the most largely circulated religious papers published in the South, in its last issue published the following among its selections:

"To prevent young apple trees from being destroyed by mice during this season of the year, the snow should be trodden down firmly about the roots and bodies of the trees to the distance of two or three feet from the trunk."

This, the editor of the Journal concludes, is certainly valuable information to the farmer who hardly ever sees a flake of snow during the whole year. "The truth is, the selector man has not enough agricultural sense to perform his duties intelligently, or else is too lazy to make judicious selections, but clips out the first bit of agricultural matter that meets his eye. The columns of the Northern agricultural papers are chiefly selected to obtain matter for the 'Agricultural Department,' and probably four-fifths of it is worthless to Southern readers." As true as preaching.

WHAT KILLS EARLY TREES.—Deep planting is one error—to plant a tree rather shallower than it formerly stood, is really the right way, whilst many plant a tree as they would a post. Roots are of two kinds—the young and tender rootlets, composed entirely of cells, the feeders of the trees, always found near the surface getting air and moisture; and roots of over one year old, which serve only as supporters of the tree and as conductors of its food. Hence the injury that ensues when the delicate rootlets are so deeply buried in earth. Placing fresh, or green manure in contact with the young roots is another great error. The place to put manure is on the surface, where the elements disintegrate, dissolve and carry it downward. Numerous forms of fungi are generated and reproduced by the application of such manures directly to the roots, and they immediately attack the tree. It is very well to enrich the soil in transplanting the tree, but the manure, if to be in contact with or very near the roots, should be thoroughly decomposed.—Plowman.

SPADES VS. LOOMS.—Governor Farnham addressed a meeting of farmers at Montpelier, Vermont, recently, and suggested the setting up again in the farm houses of the big wheel, the little wheel, and the loom. He gave as a reason for a return to the old ways the general prevalence of shoddy. The Vermont Chronicle takes exception to the advice and the premises upon which it is argued. Its editor has tried and proved to his satisfaction the quality of the products of Vermont looms, and as to the occupation of women's spare time it says: "If we were to make a suggestion in this connection, it would be that any women on the farm, who have time to spare, had better put it to use in gardening. Our wives and daughters do not give out of doors as much generally not half as much—as their health requires. Garden work is very suitable for women, and if they would do more of it, helping to provide an abundance of fresh vegetables and small fruits for use all the year round, they and their families would be every way better off in the matter of health than most of them are now."

A GARDENER'S SECRET. Peter Henderson, the veteran gardener made a very significant statement before the convention of nurserymen and florists. His statement embodies the remarkable fact that if garden seeds, when planted in the spring, are firmly pressed when under the earth, by the ball of the foot, at the time the gardeners are putting them into the ground, they will invariably grow, drought or not drought; and what is still more important, they will spring up earlier and grow faster and maturing better than any of their kind which have not been subjected to this discipline. The same rule of pressing, he says, holds true in regard to transplanting trees, shrubs and plants. This is an item of great practical value to many of our people, and especially to those who live in the suburbs.—Cleveland Herald.

Horse owners may find this recipe of Admiral Ammen for horse distemper useful for preventive treatment: Give the horse twice a day one-third of a teaspoonful of chlorate of potash dissolved in one-third of a teaspoonful of chlorate of potash dissolved in one-third of a bucket of water; for treatment of disease, give three doses daily. Feed and water as usual. This "simple and safe" cure for epizootic comes from an old veterinary surgeon of the army: "Take one pound gum asafœtida; mix it with one gallon of boiling water; stir the mixture constantly until the asafœtida is dissolved; let the mixture cool; strain, and give one half pint every three hours. This will relieve the horse within twelve hours, and give him a good appetite."

In feeding roots to cows, no rotten ones should be given them. One rotten turnip or cabbage fed to a cow giving milk may affect it with a disagreeable taste; the milk of the whole dairy, if that cow's milk is mingled with that of the rest. All decayed roots should be thrown away.

When strawberry plants are set in rows three feet apart and a foot apart in the rows, it requires 14,520 for an acre.

Household.

BUYING AND MENDING STOCKINGS.—When you buy new stockings and socks do not wear them until you have sewed open bar in heels and toes that soon breaks unless secured by sewing over. To do this, stretch the heel or toe very tightly over your left hand; this opens those little bars and enables you to sew holes top and bottom, when you can sew them over. You must not do it like herring boning, but strait and from left to right. This plan prevents many a darn. Now that stockings and socks are made with double heels and toes, the old plan of "running" them is no longer necessary; but the sewing over on the wrong side of the open bars is very important. All colored stockings and socks are best marked with a white narrow tape, with the owners name. Before the name should be put the number of the pair; after the name the number of how many pairs. In sewing on tapes do it at the edge, on the right side of the seam and on the right side of the stocking. Scarcely ever do I see a tape neatly sewed on, and one reason is, that pinching is not sufficiently taught in needlework. Pinch tightly the turnings in at each end of the tape, make them as flat and smooth as you can first and then put a fine pin in to hold it in its place. Begin at the right hand and seam it very neatly with rater fine white cotton the edge of the stocking, and when you come to the left hand corner cut off your thread, leaving a short end. Then return to the right hand corner and hem it very neatly, pinching the tape very firmly between your finger and thumb. When you come to the left hand corner tuck in the little end of thread and fasten off very neatly and invisibly. When socks and stockings come home from the laundress they should be first aired on the fender. Rheumatism is often the payment for wearing unaired stockings and for darning them without first taking that precaution. Then look them over thoroughly, putting your fingers into every nook. If a pair has one that wants darning and one that does not, turn in the foot of the one that does not need mending and fold it up, and leave the foot of the one that does want mending out, and fold it round the other; do this with each pair, and put them in a basket kept purposely for stockings, and try always to get all stockings, and socks mended and put away on Saturday. Put all newly washed stockings to the left in the drawer, and take into wear from the right, and of course put all clean socks underneath those already in the drawer. In all mending and in all kinds of needlework use as fine a needle as possible; the finer the needle and the finer the work in the more easily does it go through hard calico, etc. Eight or nine sizes do almost all a woman's work, except sewing a skirt to a band. One always finds that the bad sewers use an immense needle and coarse thread; in fact, they seem to think that one needle and one reel of thread is sufficient for everything.—New York Herald.

A JAPANESE BILL OF FARE. In the last number of the Revue Britannique is published an interesting account of a modern Japanese dinner party, from which we extract the following extraordinary menu, recommending it to the attention of those who may desire to introduce some startling novelties into the art of dining, as practiced in these islands: Boiled ducks, chopped pigeons, birds nest soup, roast mutton and bamboo buds, mussels and crabs, tea and cakes, turtle soup, minced dog, trifled rats, macaroni soup, thick rats roasted, with sweet sauce, salt fish, roast pork with rice patties, preserved melon seeds, stuffed sea frogs, walnuts stuffed with hotel leaves, ices, and fruits. Various wines were served during this amazing entertainment. The centre of the table was occupied by a huge covered bowl, containing a good store of sea-fleas, set swimming in Burgundy just before the guests sat down to dinner. By the time the meal was over, these vivacious insects had become sufficiently inebriated to exhibit an abnormal and eccentric activity; so that, when the cover restraining their saltatory exercises was removed at dessert, they afforded excellent sport to the Japanese gentlemen present, who displayed remarkable smartness in catching them with ivory chop-sticks, and in subsequently eating them alive. To British apprehensions this may appear a revolting repast; but remembering that many dishes which we and the Chinese enjoy have ugly names, that misrepresent their real character, we should suspend our judgment until we hear what the delicacies mentioned actually are. Bird's-nest soup, for instance, is a very different thing from what people who have never been in China, suppose it to be, and it is quite possible that even the black rat may be a species of ground game unknown in this country, but not the less edible for all that. We confess, however, that the sea-frogs and sea-fleas require a good deal of explanation.—American Sentry.

TURNING POTATOES INTO CHEESE. A foreign paper says that cheese is made from potatoes in Thüringia and Saxony in the manner below. Possibly the process may be found worth trying, if not profitable in this country. After having collected a quantity of potatoes, of good quality, giving the preference to a large, white kind, they are boiled in a caldron, and after becoming cool they are peeled and reduced to a pulp, either by means of a grater or mortar. To five pounds of this pulp, which ought to be as equal as possible, is added one pound of sour milk and the necessary quantity of salt. The whole is kneaded together and the mixture covered up and allowed to lie for three or four days, according to the season. At the end of this time it is kneaded anew, and the cheeses are placed in little baskets, when the superfluous moisture escapes. They are then allowed to dry in the shade, and placed in layers in large vessels, where they must remain for fifteen days. The older these cheeses are, the more their quality improves. Three kinds are made. The first and most common is made, as detailed above; the second, with four parts of potatoes and two parts of curdled milk; the third, with two parts of potatoes and four parts of cow or ewe milk. Those cheeses have this advantage over other kinds, that they do not engender worms, and keep fresh for a number of years, provided they are placed in a dry situation and in well-closed vessels.—N. E. Farmer.

LITTLE DETAILS OF LADY'S DAY WORK. If the housewife is not watchful, clothes pins and lines will be left out over night to be ruined by rust and mildew. The pins should be counted and the lines wiped before being put away, for the weeks. If not, dark spots and dingy stripes will be found on the clothes. Every housekeeper should provide the laundress with a pair of mittens for hanging out clothes, to be used for no other purpose.

Educational.

—The professors at Oxford University are not pleased by the proposed statutes providing that they shall do a little teaching. The Academy contains a letter from a correspondent advancing the theory that teaching is one of the surest means of securing genuine research and commenting upon the position of the Oxford professors. "It cannot be supposed," says the writer, "that English professors are incapable of the tasks accomplished by their brethren in Berlin. If Mommsen, Zeller, Helmholtz, and Virchow can write as they do, with an amount of lecture-work far exceeding that proposed by the Oxford University Commissioners, there is ground to hope that what has hitherto—not wholly through its own fault—been nearly the idlest professorlate in Christendom will again, with a position of a real educational force, make Oxford a power in the intellectual world."—New York Independent.

—There were on the public school registers of England and Wales last year, the names of 3,710,883 children of whom 1,208,016 were under seven years of age, 2,594,995 were in average daily attendance, and 1,084,622 passed the examination without failure in reading, writing and arithmetic. The Government gave £1,981,720, and this year will give still more. The expenditure per scholar in England and Wales is in voluntary schools about $8.75 for each scholar; and in board schools about $10.50. There were 1,561 night schools in operation, containing 52,530 scholars above twelve years of age. The inspectors found 29,736 certificated teachers at work in the aided schools which they visited, while the forty-one training colleges, from which the supply of such teachers is mainly recruited, were attended in 1879 by 3,108 students. The elementary schools in England and Wales, provides room for 2,376,280 children more than in 1870.

—It has been formally determined that the Western Reserve College shall be removed to Cleveland, the trustees having accepted Mr. Amasa Stone's offer of $500,000 and the subscription list by the citizens of Cleveland of $110,000. A beautiful plot of forty acres on Euclid ave. has been selected as the site of the University. The Case School of Applied Science, which has an endowment of $1,250,000, is to be a part of the institution; and this sum, with Mr. Stone's $500,000 and the Western Reserve College endowment fund of $200,000, will give the new University an aggregate of $2,000,000. The college and the Case School, though really united, will be practically conducted as two schools, each having its own trustees and rules; both, however, will be under the control of a Board of Regents. They will use the same library, apparatus and lecture halls.

—The trustees of Cornell University have appropriated $100,000 for immediate improvements. Fifty thousand dollars are to be spent in building and equipping a physical laboratory. It is proposed to establish departments of mining engineering, metallurgy, and music.

The State of New Jersey offers the sum of twenty dollars to every one of her free public schools, with which to start a library, provided the district raises as much more. Ten dollars is added yearly, upon the same conditions.

The sixty-first annual catalogue of the Autumn, (N. Y.,) Theological Seminary shows a total attendance during the present year of thirty-five students. Nineteen colleges and universities are represented in the institution, of which the Rev. Samuel M. Hopkins, D. D., is president.

—In Germany the Victoria Lyceum in Berlin, provides for women regular examinations and certificates of excellence in the higher studies. A clair is held by a female Ph. D. In Italy the universities are open to women, and preparatory schools have been established in some cities.

—The Seminary for young ladies at Nashville, Tenn., under the charge of the proprietor, the Rev. W. E. Ward, is said to be the largest institution of its kind in the South. It was opened in 1855 and has graduated five hundred and sixty-three students. The present attendance is two hundred and forty-five.

The State of New Jersey offers the sum of twenty dollars to every one of her free public schools, with which to start a library, provided the district raises as much more. Ten dollars is added yearly, upon the same conditions.

The sixty-first annual catalogue of the Autumn, (N. Y.,) Theological Seminary shows a total attendance during the present year of thirty-five students. Nineteen colleges and universities are represented in the institution, of which the Rev. Samuel M. Hopkins, D. D., is president.

—In Germany the Victoria Lyceum in Berlin, provides for women regular examinations and certificates of excellence in the higher studies. A clair is held by a female Ph. D. In Italy the universities are open to women, and preparatory schools have been established in some cities.

—The Seminary for young ladies at Nashville, Tenn., under the charge of the proprietor, the Rev. W. E. Ward, is said to be the largest institution of its kind in the South. It was opened in 1855 and has graduated five hundred and sixty-three students. The present attendance is two hundred and forty-five.

Mallock Matched.

BY THE INTELLIGENT REPORTER WHO READS AND INVESTIGATES.—WHAT MAKES LIFE WORTH LIVING IN NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans Democrat, March 29.

W. H. Mallock exhausted himself in an elaborate and celebrated work on the absorbing question, "Is Life Worth Living?" Of course, it goes without saying, he concluded that life was wholly illusory and unsatisfactory, because it was the chasing of an ignis fatuus from the cradle to the grave. If we were materially well to do, we were racked with intellectual tears and spiritual doubts; if firm in faith and steadfast in intellectual purpose, we were poor in purse, were physically tormented by disease and unhappy. Hence life is not worth living.

The reporter of the Democrat had just finished reading this work when he was notified that he must prepare to make a study of a highly important subject. During the past week a series of articles have been published in this paper, recounting certain interesting statements, as developed in other large cities, and with the purpose of knowing if the same condition of affairs existed here, he was detailed to make a careful investigation.

Arming himself with the fact that no less than a dozen of the most prominent public men of the land had died during the past year of Bright's disease and kindred kidney affections, and that these diseases are increasing at the rate of 200 per cent. per decade, he began the work of local investigation with a view to finding out what efforts were being wrought in New Orleans by the only known cure of these hitherto "incurable diseases."

The first person called upon was Mr. Antoine B. C. Lecost, the well-know planter, of 300 Chartres street. Having stated his mission, Mr. Lecost bade the reporter take a chair, and to him related his experience, as follows:

He was physically broken down. His stomach refused to do the commonest digestion; his liver was turned to a serious degree, and his kidneys made life miserable for him. He had been unfit to attend to business for a long time, and was unable to obtain any relief from the doctors. At length, hearing of the wonderful cures Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure was affecting with persons afflicted like himself, he purchased half a dozen bottles and was taking it regularly and with very marked benefit. His general health had been improved, his kidneys and liver were resuming their natural work, and he proposed to continue its use to the end that he might be restored a whole.

The reporter thanked him for his kindness, and took the Magazine street car and repaired to the handsome home of Mr. S. Guiffre, of 501 Constance street, whom every one in New Orleans knows, he being one of our leading citizens; and was most graciously received by Mr. Guiffre.

"I understand, Mr. Guthrie," said the scribe, "that you have been using Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, and that you consider it the most wonderful of all products of modern scientific research?" "Yes, sir, I have, and I am only too glad to tell you what perfect work it has wrought in me. I first began the use of the remedy about two years ago. I was in very feeble condition. My health was all broken up. I suffered excruciating pains from stone in the bladder and complicated kidney troubles. I did not consult a physician, because, you know, they admit that they cannot cure aggravated cases of chronic kidney and bladder disease.

"I read an advertisement of Warner's Cure in the papers, and, at the earnest solicitation of my wife, I purchased several bottles and began its use, somewhat skeptical of the result. I passed a stone from the organs it infested, with the most excruciating sufferings; have since been in perfect health, and, for a man of my age, Mr. Guthrie is 70, feel as strong and robust as I did before I ever knew an ache or a pain. I can assure you, sir, it is all it professes to be—a perfect cure for Kidney and Liver diseases."

"I am very glad to know that it has been such a boon to you, Mr. Guthrie. Have any other persons of your acquaintance been using it?"

"Well, yes, sir; you see I recommended it to all my friends, and every one who has used it thinks as much of it as I do. A lady member of my own family has taken several bottles. I have used four bottles in all, and would not be where I could not get it promptly for all the distressing, broken down feeling so common among our ladies, and she has been completely restored to perfect health as a result. And so, could the founding of every more medicine do more praise than I can."

"I don't see how such could be," remarked the interviewer. "Would you object to giving me a statement of your case?"

"Oh, not at all, sir. I give it very cheerfully, for I am profoundly grateful for what it has done for me."

The reporter thanked him for the courtesy and the suggestion of Mr. Guthrie, called on Mr. John R. Mycomb, at 30 Camp street, in the well-reported paper house of R. F. Pollock & Co., Mr. Mycomb is one of our best known and most popular business men. The reporter "caught him on the wing" as he was just about to take to his heels, and by the day time since using this remedy. Specific good word to encourage the Guthrie's friends.

Also such is the case. The reporter visited a number of prominent gentlemen and ladies, whose names the writer is not at liberty to publish. They all, without exception, found Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure to be not to do just what was said of it, and most of them kept it on the house constantly, though they confessed that they felt themselves cured for life. Many of them had drank large quantities of mineral waters, but the effect was only temporary.

When they had had Bright's and other Kidney diseases (the name itself left made them shudder before this cure was put upon the market) and the doctors could do nothing but Death, they shall keep snatched from the jaws of death by Warner's wonderful Safe Kidney and Liver Cure.

Assassination of Rulers.—Historic Parallels.

BY DISTRIBUTUS, JR.

e student of the annals of human ress finds a radical similarity be- different epochs and different tes. It has been said that if you ch a Russian you find a Tartar; it is true that under every phase of anity the same passions and char- ristics are found. The murder of czar startles mankind, but the r of history has long since become stomed to such events. He knows they have occured in all time and ywhere, and holds himself ready r to be surprised at them. From st number of attempted and suc- ful assassinations, such may be ected as will reflect the clearest light human nature.

XERXES THE GREAT.

he fought at Thermopylæ, at Pla- and at Salamis; who assembled the st army ever known among men; was possessed of whatever is grand- and most brilliant in the opinion of : he whose empire was at that time greatest in the world, whose treas- were incomputable and who, not satisfied with the abject submis- of many nations, took pleasure in ing his power over nature, cut- anals through mountains, and ering them navigable, punishing a for having dashed in pieces his ge of bots, attempting to shackle waves by throwing fetters upon n this furious or ruthless Persian ed was assassinated by Artabanus, ain of his guards.

HENRY IV., OF FRANCE.

This Prince was murdered by RAVAIL- lac on the 14th of May, 1610. It was a ed by a person of the noblest men who e Universe permitted to hold an exalted position on the earth. It is ubtful if to tell whether this crime s sprung from the designs of a party, or was from the frenzied imagination of the perpetrator. The assassin protested to the last that he had no accomplices. The king was struck twice to the heart with a knife and died at once. His crime is illustrious, and will so remain until the last syllable of recorded time- No sovereign, or ruler, not even Washington, ever more entirely merited possessed the affections of the people. Voltaire says of Henry IV.: "Should a faithful picture of this illustrious monarch ever be drawing the hearing of a righteous Freemen who had never been acquainted with his name, and should be told in order to enable that this very man was at length assassinated in the midst of his people by a person to whom he had never done any injury, it would be impossible for him to believe it."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

It is not necessary to say any thing upon an event the memory of which is as vivid in this country as though it were yesterday. The events previously recorded, with the exception of the murder of Cæsar, transpired in monarchies and hotbeds of despotism; this event, the less strange than any of the others, was committed in a Republic.—New York Christian Advocate.

SCOTCH COLONY OF RUGBY'S NEW SETTLERS.

Rugby, the settlement of the English Land Company, recently dedicated by Hon. Thomas Hughes, is being rapidly peopled with sturdy sons of England. The settlers are not a party of idlers, but, when once they get ranches the land so generously given them by the philanthropists across the waters, they lose not a moment in providing themselves with habitations, temporary, it is true, but amply sufficient to accommodate their present wants. Among the recent acquisitions to the colony are Messrs. Millmoor, Blalock, Maude, Wallace, Balanson, Riddell, Marshall, Vongelein, Delhoarse, Gardner and Beale. All these are Englishmen by birth, and have very recently come to America. Each one is now engaged in building a temporary dwelling for his family, who have been sent for, and will soon arrive.

Mr. Maude is Emperry for the Queen, and will raise stock in that vicinity for her Royal Highness. Fine grazing lands a-plenty there, and the stock will be unmolested by prowling thieves, and unscampered by forgetful gatekeepers. They will have a country home and the hunter's and the best of Tennessee stock will be produced.

Mr. Blalock was a minister in England. He left that country with seven sons, and will form near Rugby. He is one of the most valued citizens, and Mr. Curtis Clark, the manager and superintendent, remarked of him, that Rugby's glorious future would in truth be assured if one hundred such ministers with seven hundred such sons had emigrated there in a body.

The majority have purchased farms and will raise stock, cultivate grain and grow vegetables for Chattanooga and Cincinnati markets. Others have embarked into other enterprises, several will deal largely in lumber, among others a Mr. Redhill and a Mr. Gibson, the latter formerly of Cincinnati, but originally of England. Mr. Redhill is now living here on a Rugby, a $5,000 residence.

The report that all the officials at Rugby are Englishmen, is untrue. The only English officials are the Ingleside and the Cashier, Mr. Hastings Hughes, Thomas Hughes' brother, is at Rugby, but in the capacity of an official, but not in the capacity of an official, but solely to represent his brother's interests. Mr. Clark, the Manager and Superintendent, as well as the Assistant Superintendents and all the other officials are Americans.—Chattanooga Times.

A HOOSIER WOMAN'S CHARM.—Girls who think that it is necessary to be beautiful in order to be attractive, should get bravely over that notion. A young lady's plainness while, by the way, saves her from many annoyances and dangers need have nothing to do with her happiness if only her disposition is amiable, her mind cultured, and her heart kind and pure.

The story is told of a famous lady who once reigned in Paris society, that she was so homely that her mother said one day: "My poor child, you are too ugly for any one to ever fall in love with you."

From this time Madam de Pressan began to be very kind both to the children of the village and to the servants of the household, even the lords that happened about the castle walks. She was always distressed if she happened to be unable to render a service.

This good will toward every body made her the idol of the city. Though her complexion was sallow, her gray eyes small and sunken, yet she had an eloquence of the countenance that riveted the attention to her the greatest night of her life. Her unselfish interest in others made her, it is said, perfectly irresistible. Her life furnishes a valuable lesson.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured and, as to demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proved by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

—The Hon. John I. Blair has given $10,000 to LaFayette College for the endowment of the President's chair. This is independent of her magnificent donations of Mr. Blair, who is not only one of the richest men in New Jersey, but one of its most liberal citizens.

There is More Strength

restoring power in a 50 cent bottle of Parker's Ginger Tonic than in a bushel of roast or a gallon of milk. As an appetizer, blood purifier and kidney corrector, there is nothing like it, and invalids find it a wonderful invigorant for mind and body. See other column.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

HARRISONBURG, Va., April 5.—Rev. Benj. Arbogast, President of the Valley Female College, and a distinguished member for years of the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, died at his residence in Winchester, Va., Thursday afternoon last, after a protracted illness, of consumption.

He was well known throughout the valley of Virginia, Southwestern Virginia and Georgia, where he had been engaged in teaching and preaching. He was in the fifty-fifth year of his age.

CINCINNATI, April 5.—In a total vote of about 45,000 in this city yesterday, Wm. Means, Democrat, was elected Mayor over Chas. Jacobs, Jr., Republican, by 2514 majority.

The Republicans elected six of the City Buildings officers by majorities ranging from 307 to 1543, chiefly about 1200, and three out of four members of the Board of Education by majorities ranging from 141 to 933. The Democrats elected the other member by 473 majority. The scratching was unprecedented, and the difficulty in counting the vote extraordinary.

YANKTON, D. T., April 5.—The water has risen to a point a foot higher than the rise of March 29th. Lower Yankton is submerged to-day, and the people have been removed to the upper portion of the city.

Intelligence has been received to-day from Ronnhomme that out of fourteen persons teh have been rescued alive and well. A family named Bates and one named Haddeman are undoubtedly drowned. Seven other families are probably lost, six miles this side of Green Island. The people have been in part removed to this place: no lives were lost there, but the village is completely washed away. Water and ice to the depth of twelve feet lie across the village site.

ST. LOUIS, April 6.—Complete returns of the election show that a most remarkable revolution has taken place in the Democratic party. Returns from all precincts give the following vote for Mayor:

Wm. L. Ewing, Republican, 21,508.
Henry Overstolz, Democrat, 11,353.
Ewing's majority 10,255.

The remainder of the Republican ticket is elected by majorities ranging from 12,000 to 13,000. Six republican members of the upper house of the Municipal Assembly receive majorities of from 4500 to 5000.

This is not claimed as a straight Republican victory, but it is the result of bitter contention among Democrats and most determined opposition to Overstolz and the manner in which he was nominated by a large faction of that party.

YANKTON, D. T., April 7.—The ice gorge broke to-day, and the water is now falling. Lower Yankton has been submerged since Monday, the lower floors of about two hundred dwellings having been under water.

Intelligence from the submerged farming district was received last night. Rescuing parties have found and landed in places of safety, about two hundred persons, who must have perished with cold and hunger, had they not been reached. The work still goes on, and hopes are entertained that nearly all ice and water-bound sufferers will be saved.

NEW YORK, April 8.—At the Bringley sale last night the Guttenberg Bible, first book printed with movable type, was sold for eight thousand dollars.

INDIANAPOLIS, April 8.—The House yesterday morning passed the joint resolution, by a vote of sixty-two to twenty-four, amending the constitution by giving women the right to vote at all State elections.

CHICAGO, April 8.—A dispatch from Yankton, D. T., says: The flood is subsiding and the Missouri River is now, at that point, within the banks, although the bottom lands, in many places, are still submerged. Altogether about one thousand people have been rescued from farm houses; many, however, have not been reached, owing to the impassible character of the ice walls surrounding them, and it is feared they may perish from hunger and exposure before relief can reach them. Question of providing for the survivors who have lost their all through the floods, is pressing, for there are thousands who have been reduced to absolute want.

WASHINGTON, April 11.—Mrs. Blaine, Mrs. Sherman and a number of other ladies prominent in Washington society and well known throughout the country, have made an appeal to the people of the United States in behalf of the sufferers from the recent disastrous earthquake in Ohio.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, April 5.—A dispatch from Madrid says: From the towers of Seville Cathedral, the country appears like a vast lake. The inundation is the most serious that has occurred this century. The gas works and the Duke of Montpensier's palace, and many streets in the upper part of the town are flooded.

LONDON, April 6.—The Superintendent of the Eastern Telegraph Company at Smyrna, telegraphs under date of April 1, that the company's officers in Chio reported that continued shocks of earthquake were destroying the houses injured by the first shock, on April 3d. It is said to be utterly impossible to enter the town. The telegraph office is nearly destroyed, and the operators are working temporarily from the landing place of the cable. Food and shelter are urgently needed. A steamer chartered by the municipality of Syra left on Monday with medical aid, provisions and tents.

It is feared that the number killed and wounded will prove to be enormous.

HAVANA, April 8.—There were thirty-three deaths from small-pox in this city during the week ending yesterday.

LONDON, April 8.—A dispatch from Chio, dated Thursday evening, says: Slight shocks of earthquake continue. Large quantities of blankets, goods and medicines are shipped from Syria by each steamer. Two hundred sappers have left Prevesa in a gunboat to bury the dead. The number of killed is variously estimated at from four thousand to six thousand; the injured are more than twice the number of killed.

LONDON, April 9.—A dispatch from Chio says: A medical commission is now sitting to consider the expediency of levelling the rubbish of the fortress where, as there is no hope of saving any lives, and the disinterment of the dead might produce an epidemic.

It is now believed throughout the whole island, which contained 70,000 inhabitants, that six or seven thousand were killed and 25 per cent. of the survivors wounded.

French, British, United States and Austrian gun vessels in the harbor are doing all in their power to assist the authorities in the work of relief. Only ten of the inhabitants of Chesme were killed, but many houses are in ruins, and thirty thousand people are without shelter.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 10.—At the trial of the Nihilists on Saturday, Assistant Prosecutor Muranieff strongly denounced the revolutionary doctrines and deeds averred by the accused, and demanded the severest penalty for all alike, and concluded by declaring that the fidelity of the people to the imperial throne was unshaken, and that the efforts of the terrorist party in this direction had proved absolutely abortive.

The prisoners listened unmoved. Jeliaboff and Kobaltschitch took notes. At 5:30 in the afternoon a recess was taken until 7 o'clock, when the counsel for the defense spoke for two hours.

About 9 o'clock Jeliaboff rose to speak in his own behalf. He was several times interrupted by the presiding judge. When Jeliaboff finished the court asked the accused if they had any further defense to urge, and they replied in the negative.

The court retired for consultation, and returned at 12:30 this morning. Twenty-four questions formulated for determination concerning the prisoners' guilt were then read, and the court again retired to consider the verdict. After three hours' determination they returned, at 6:20 A. M., with a verdict of guilty against all, and sentenced to death by hanging was pronounced. Sophie Pieofsky's sentence will be submitted to the Czar for confirmation, because she is of noble birth.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 11.—Sentence of death was finally read to-day in the presence of the Nihilist prisoners. They were allowed twenty-four hours to appeal.

LONDON, April 11.—A dispatch to the Times from Candahar says: General Hume has published an order to evacuate Candahar, which, subject to the approval of the commander in chief, will commence on the 13th inst., final evacuation taking place on the 22d inst. Sham Sudhin Khan, a deputy of Gov. ernment, who has been here during the past few days, is arranging for taking control over the civil administration.

LONDON, April 11.—A bulletin issued at 11 o'clock, this morning, says: Lord Beaconsfield's strength is somewhat diminished.

Drs. Quain and Kidd will call several times during the day. Dr. Bruce remains at Beaconsfield's residence. The condition of the patient is very critical, although the doctors have not abandoned all hope.

It was announced at noon that Lord Beaconsfield's condition had in no way improved.

The State University.

Pursuant to adjournment, the Supervisors of the Louisiana State University and Mechanical and Agricultural College, assembled in the University building at Baton Rouge, at noon on Tuesday, Governor Wiltz, President, in the chair, and Messrs. Fay, Johnston, Jastremski, Strong, Clegg, Walton, Pipes and Thorpe, present.

The report of the Finance Committee upon the claims of Col. D. F. Boyd, the former Superintendent of the College, was submitted, allowing certain bills and disallowing others.

The board took up the several items and allowed Col. Boyd between three and four thousand dollars.

The board, however, refused to pay certain amounts which were contracted by Col. Boyd without authority, leaving the question open as to settlement in such cases with the creditors themselves.

A claim of Dr. J. W. Dupuy, for balance of salary during the years 1879 and 1880 as Professor of Anatomy and Physiology and medical attendance upon the cadets, to the amount of about $1300, was allowed. An appropriation was made for a sufficient amount to pay for a steam engine.

The President of the Faculty was requested to report at the next meeting the requirements of the University in its several departments, with a view to more efficient service.

Messrs. Jastremski, Johnston and Pipes were appointed a committee to make the necessary arrangement for the commencement exercises, which will take place upon the Fourth of July. Hon. Jefferson Davis will be invited to be present upon the occasion. Senator Jones was spoken of as the one most available to deliver the annual oration.

There being no other business the meeting adjourned, the Governor, State Superintendent Fay, and Col. John Clegg taking the J. M. White, for New Orleans, arriving in the city between 10 and 11 o'clock on Wednesday night.

Secretary of State Strong proceeded to his home in Winn parish, where he proposes to remain a week or ten days before returning to New Orleans.

The Governor and supervisors inspected the University throughout and found every department in excellent condition. The drill of the cadets under the orders of their commandant, Lieut. Lamar, was also witnessed and pronounced excellent throughout, the youngsters going through their evolutions with the quickness and precision of regular soldiers.—New Orleans Picayune.

THE GULF STREAM.—There is a river in the ocean. In the severest drouths it never fails, and in the mightiest flood it never overflows. Its bank and its bottom are of cold water, while its current is of warm. The Gulf of Mexico is its fountain, and its mouth is in the Arctic seas. It is the Gulf Stream. There is in the world no other so majestic a flow of water. Its current is more swift than the Mississippi or the Amazon, and its volume more than 1,000 times greater. Its waters so far as the Carolina coast are indigo blue. They are so distinctly marked that the common sea water can be traced with the eye. Often one-half the vessel may be seen floating in the Gulf Stream waters while the other half is in the common water of the sea, so sharp is the line and want of affinity between these waters and such, too, the reluctance, so to speak, on the part of those of the Gulf Stream to mingle with the common waters of the sea. In addition to these, there is another peculiar fact. The fishermen on the coast of Norway are supplied with wood from the tropics by the Gulf Stream. Think of the Arctic fishermen burning upon their hearths the palms of Havti, the mahogany of Honduras and the precious woods of the Amazon and Orinoco.—Hall's Journal.

—The proposed visit of Moody and Sankey to New Orleans will be postponed for sometime on account of the immense quantity of work which they are doing in San Francisco, and which is yet to be done in that city. As they propose to visit England during the coming Spring and Summer, if they should be detained much longer in California the trip to New Orleans must be postponed indefinitely. In any event their stay will not be long. From New Orleans they will go to New York and take steamer for England.—Tribune.

A Lady Correspondent.

Mr. Editor: In a recent issue of your paper "Daisy B." writes to know what to do when she has the "blues." Now, I have been troubled with that very unpleasant and essentially feminine complaint in the past, and I am quite sure my experience will help her. I don't believe the indigo feelings come because things don't go right around us, but because matters don't go right with us. Every lady understands this and knows the cause. For years I suffered terribly, and I now see that I might have avoided it all had I known what I do to-day. I tried taking Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure as an experiment, and it did for me more than I could ever have dreamed it possible to do or any woman. I would not be without it for the world, and I earnestly advise Daisy B. or any other lady troubled as she was to find the means which I did and I am sure it will have the same effect.

EASTER HYMN.

BY MRS. H. W. BEADBURN.

"Because I live, ye shall live also."

Now comes the sweetest sabbath of the year
The Easter bells are ringing,
And, fancy-led, we almost seem to hear
The angels' welcome singing
And we a tribute of our joy would bring Unto the risen Lord who is our King.

Right royally he sits upon the throne
Where seraphs now are bending,
Yet he will not reject us, or disown
Our humble prayer ascending.
He knows full well how greatly we lay
Thank offerings upon the shrine today.

And well he knows how, deep within our hearts,
Are joys as yet unspoken;
The voiceless thought, the trembling tear that starts,
Must be their only token;
Yet trustfully we look into his face,
And thank him for his wondrous love and grace!

Oh, Lord of life and light! Thy boundless love
Exceeds our feeble story,
To thee be praise from all below, above;
Thy name have all the glory!
And here, to thee, we raise an altar stone
For "Roberto" thy hand hath led us on!

Oh, lead us still! and help us evermore
Our fondest hopes to credit
Upon the treasure which thou hast in store,
The glory we may enter!
Help us to overcome through all the way,
And find with every morn an Easter day!

The Methodist Ecumenical Conference.

[Regulations, programme of exercises, and resolutions adopted by the Eastern and Western sections of the executive committee.]

REGULATIONS FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFERENCE.

I. For convenience of organization, and for the purposes of equity and fraternity, the whole Methodist community shall be included in four general divisions, as follows:

First Division.—The British Wesleyan Methodist Churches.

Second Division.—Other British Methodist Churches.

Third Division.—The Methodist Churches in the United States and Canada having an episcopal form of government.

Fourth Division.—The Methodist Churches in the United States and Canada having a non-episcopal form of government.

It is understood that the several churches described are inclusive of their respective mission fields and affiliated Conferences.

II. There shall be a business committee consisting of twenty members, five of whom shall be selected from each general division, and two of whom, if possible, shall be laymen. This committee shall be chosen by the Eastern and Western Sections of the executive committee, on nomination of the members of said executive committee representing respectively the several general divisions. The first named on the business committee by the first (European) division shall be the convenor, but the committee shall choose by ballot its own chairman and secretary. All questions, proposals, resolutions, communications, or other matters, not included in the regular programme of exercises, which are intended to be brought before the Conference, shall be sent first to the business committee. The final twenty minutes of the second session of each day shall be set apart for reports from the business committee, but such reports shall at all times be privileged, and shall take precedence of any other matter which may be before the Conference.

III. The business committee shall appoint some one to preside on each day of the Conference, and in the following manner, to wit: on the first day, from the first division; on the second day, from the third division; on the third day, from the second division; on the fourth day, from the fourth division; repeating this order as long as the Conference may remain in session.

IV. The business committee, at the opening of the first regular business session of the Conference, shall nominate four secretaries, one from each general division, the one named from the first (European) division to be chief; but if the nominations thus made shall fail of confirmation, in whole or in part, then the Conference shall proceed to fill the vacant place, or places, in such manner as it may determine: provided that the mode of distribution herein indicated shall be maintained.

V. Every session of the Conference shall be opened with devotional exercises to be conducted by some person selected by the president for the day.

VI. The first hour of each forenoon session, after devotional exercises and reading of journal, shall be set apart for the presentation of resolutions or other papers, not included in the regular programme. Every resolution must be reduced to writing and be signed by at least two names. The Conference may, at any time, close the morning hour and proceed to the regular order, but the question must be taken without debate, or subsidiary motion.

VII. No paper presented in the regular programme shall occupy more than twenty minutes in reading; the invited speaker who follows shall be allowed ten minutes; after which thirty minutes shall be allowed for remarks; provided that no member shall occupy more than five minutes, nor speak more than once in the same subject.

VIII. At the close of the regular order, at the final session of each day, the president shall call for a report from the business committee. In the letting on such reports, whenever presented, no member shall occupy more than ten minutes, nor speak more than once in the same report; and the chairman of the committee, or some one designated by him, shall be allowed ten minutes in which to close the debate.

IX. All votes taken in the Conference shall be by individual count, without any reference to the particular body with which the voter is connected.

X. Any addition or alteration to these regulations, thought desirable, must be sent to the business committee and reported back to the Conference before a final vote is taken; and no rule shall be suspended, except by consent of two-thirds of the Conference.

RESOLUTIONS.

1. That the Ecumenical Conference meet in City Road chapel, London, Wednesday, September 7, 1881, and continue till the 20th, inclusive; that there be two sessions a day, except Saturdays; and that the hours of session be from 10 a. m. to 1 p. m. and from 2:30 p. m. to 5 p. m.

2. That the odd numbers on the programme be left for the designation of essayists to the Eastern Section, and that the even numbers be filled by the Western Section; and that the invited speakers to follow on the even numbers be selected by the Eastern Section, and the invited speakers to follow on the odd numbers be selected by the Western Section.

3. That Friday, August 5, be designated as a special day of fasting and prayer, to be observed by the Methodists of all lands, for the blessing of God to rest on the Ecumenical Conference.

4. The Western Section of the committee adopted the following minute: "That we are desirous that arrangements shall be made to keep the Conference together unbroken during its session; but we assent to the holding of meetings at other points, so far as may be without disturbing the unity of work and worship; and both before and after the Conference, American brethren will be ready to assist, if desired, in connectional meetings in any part of the kingdom." In accordance with this resolution, the Eastern Section has arranged for meetings at "Manchester, Hull, Birmingham, Bristol, Leeds, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Truro, Hanley, Plymouth, Sheffield, and Lincoln, with a farewell meeting at Liverpool—all the expenses of these local meetings to be provided by the respective localities."

The Western Section also concurs in the suggestion that Love-feasts be held at a suitable time in the north, south, east and west of London, under the direction of the local committee.

5. That a joint publication committee be provided to secure the publication of the proceedings of the Conference.

6. That in accordance with the special request of the Eastern Section, Rev. Bishop Simpson, D. D., LL. D., be designated to preach the opening sermon before the Conference.

Educational.

In the ADVOCATE of March 17, is an article upon the above named subject, by Rev. J. W. Rush. He says his heart was made glad, by hearing the announcement of Dr. A. G. Haygood that Mr. Seney of New York, had given $10,000 to Emory College. So was mine. I am glad that the spirit of God is moving some rich men to do good with their money; may the Lord increase the number a thousand fold. Perhaps no better use can be made of it than to build up Christian institutions of learning. There our young men receive such training and are brought under such godly examples and Christian influence, as they can not find in the State schools. Many of them become Christians, and are called to the great work of the ministry, and go out to bless the church and the world with sanctified learning. Intellectual culture, married to moral and religious training, is a blessing to all who give it and recieve it; but mere intellectual cultivation is not infrequently a power for evil. The three departments or modes of mental action must be guarded through the entire educational course. The Church of God to be successful in the great contest, that is being made by the various schemes of infidelity and the devil, must avail itself of sanctified learning. We need educated laymen, and an educated ministry, and both baptized with the Holy Ghost; and then the Church will take the world. Nothing can stand before it; to be captured or crushed, is the only alternative, a call to preach is also a call to prepare; and a preacher ought to know everything. Let rich men, whom God has blessed with thousands and millions, endow all the Christian colleges in the land, and build as many more and thereby become blessings to mankind.

I thank Mr. Seney for his gift, and pray that God's blessing may come richly upon him and the noble institution, which has been the recipient of his benefaction. The eternal future only can reveal the great good Emory College has already done for the world. It was never my good fortune to sit within its sacred walls, and learn at the feet of those grand old men, of whom Brother Rush speaks, but I love them and honor them; and thank God, I have had the privelege and the pleasure of hearing some of them preach the everlasting gospel. Bishop Pierce, Drs. Means, Sasnett, Branham and Dr. O. L. Smith; so you see I have been a beneficiary of this grand old Christian institution. O, ye rich men! if you would do good, pour your treasures into the lap of colleges and schools that are dedicated to the cause of Christ. You will then do a work that will not lose its power this side of the judgment. One college devoted to Christian education, well endowed and well managed, exerts a greater influence for the well-being of society, and the stability of good government, than all the political management and cunning, that has ever been perpetrated. What has Emory College done for the State of Georgia? to say nothing about other Christian institutions. Sets not all the influence of the Christian men and ministers, trained and educated at Emory from the society and civilization of Georgia, and it will not be the State it now is. The same may be said of all such institutions. God bless the men who give their money or labors to such centers of good. I have had dreams, like Brother Rush, but, ah me! they were nothing but dreams. But, I grant, there was, as he says, "a delicious ecstacy" in the dream. So I love to dream.

I am glad he wants to be "rich, big rich." Then our noble institutions, Greensboro, Tuskegee, Summerfield and Greenville would rise up to grand and beautiful proportions; if the philosophy of my wife did not spoil it all. She says that rich men have the money and the poor have the will. I suggested to her—that would make it all right when the poor get rich, then the two essentials would be together. But she says not so, and insists as riches come in, the will goes out. But perhaps this would not be so with him. At any rate I feel like praying that Brother Rush may be "big rich," for the benefit of our colleges in Alabama. It is true, in the South we have but few rich men. Perhaps, that is all the better for us. You know the Book teaches, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Now if we had a great many rich men, they might give so much, that some of us might think it was not necessary to give anything; and thereby lose the blessing. As it now stands, we are all poor, so all must give, and all get the blessing. Drops enough will make an ocean. And V's and X's enough will endow a college. The $15,000 ought to come, yes, it must come. But this brother and his circuit are very poor; still we both need a blessing, and therefore must give.

J. W. SOLOMON,

SPARTA, Alabama, March 19, 1881.

Field Notes.

Rev. Albert T. Galloway, Winfield circuit, Louisiana Conference, writing April 4, says: "For the most part the churches are in rather a bad state. But we have had some good times already. Congregations tolerably good. Attention remarkable. Much room here to work for the ADVOCATE, and we are working and will work. Bro. W. D. Slayton is still in Constantia, very low, but improving. Been in bed five months.

Farmers moving well. General health good. Peaches all killed. Frost and ice nearly every night.

MT. CARMEL, Miss., April 11, 1881.—We are working on Mt. Carmel circuit our fourth year, and generally I believe. Prospects for religious success more gloomy than any year of our pastorate so far, yet we are working, praying, hoping, trusting; season more backward than usual; all early planting will have to be planted again, or replanted if a stand is secured. Harsh winter and lingers "loth to let us be." Labor has been scarce and slow to act. The farming interests are very unfavorable. Provisions are scarce and high for this country. The question of education is receiving more attention than ever before here. G. W. BROWN.

HOUSTON, Miss., April 13, 1881.—The second Quarterly Conference for Adams and Bogue Chitto circuit was held at Bogue Chitto on the ninth and tenth instant. Bro. Johnson, our presiding elder, was with us and gave us three splendid, practical sermons. Stewards' report, especially from Bogue Chitto, was good, only one-third of the year gone and nearly one-half of their assessment paid. The good people of Bogue Chitto are trying to build a church and any help from abroad would be thankfully received. Address Henry J. Marshall, Bogue Chitto, Miss.

H. F. LEWIS.

Woman's Missionary Advocate, for April has been received. It is an excellent number. The editor says: "Truth is a torch—the more 'tis shook, it shines;" and if our genuinely good workers—the few who always attend their monthly meetings—will cease to tremble and bewilder their brains in the effort to have something new and startling to render their meetings attractive, and thus induce all the members to attend, and will make an extra effort to interest themselves still more by study, reading, and prayer, they will find they have pursued the very course to attract others. The new lessons they have learned, and the "secret refreshings" they have gained, will be unconsciously imparted to others. The creative power in prayer done is wonderful. Go on, then, to the monthly meetings and pray on, and others will drop in one at a time, to see what it is that takes you there, and thus the masses of our Christian women will join us, and the electric chain will be strengthened; from Auxiliary to Auxiliary, from Conference Society to Conference Society.

Friendliness is that quality which makes a man prompt to feel and to show a kindly interest in his fellows. Friendship is a peculiar attachment between two persons of congenial minds, who have hearty respect and esteem for and confidence in each other. Friendliness may be exercised toward a hundred or a thousand alike. Friendship is in its very nature exceptional; therefore, as Lord Bacon says, "There is little friendship in the world."—S. S. Times.

Princely Giving.

The late Dr. Franz von Hellet has bequeathed his library, containing some 70,000 volumes, to the Johanneum of Graz, where he was educated.

Mrs. Oswald Ottendorfer, New York, has given $35,000 to be known as the German Printers' Memorial Fund. Of this amount German teachers in the Seminary at Milwaukee receive $10,000; free German school, New York City, $10,000; German school; Nineteenth ward, school of the Teachers' Association, New York, and Prof. Adler's school, $5000 each.

The will of the late John C. Brooks, of Portland, Me., contains the following public bequests: American Board and the Bangor Theological Seminary, $1000; American Bible Society, American Tract Society, Boston, American Tract Society, New York, Home Missionary Society, New York, Maine Missionary Society, Widows' Wood Society, Portland, $500, and Association for the relief of aged and indigent women in Portland, $500 each. After the payment of all bequests specified in the will, the residue of Mr. Brooks's property is to be given to the American Board.—Western Christian Advocate.

Good Words.

There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea;
There's a kindness in his justice
Which is more than liberty.
For the love of God is broader
Than the measures of man's mind,
And the heart of the Eternal
Is most wonderfully kind.
If our love were but more simple,
We should take him at his word,
And our lives would be all sunshine
In the sweetness of the Lord.

F. W. Faber.

A man has been known, in his dreams, to walk in perfect safety on the edge of a giddy precipice; but let something disturb that unwholesome slumber, some light sunk down to the soulless cavern of his own dreaming phantasy, some voice, which is not a mere dull echo of the impressions from within: there is a sudden start, a wild scream, a while robe whirling through the air, and he is killed. The death pang ends, but it ends in death; the waking certainly begins, but it begins in life eternal. Ah! me, so may it be! when the chill day-spring of eternity falls first, in all the clearness of its agonizing reality, upon the glaring light of man's illusions. "Like a dream when one awaketh." Were it not better to awake to reality, to be sensible of peril and folly, before the dream and the fear are over.

Farrar.

God is the God of love. Christianity is a religion of love. Jesus Christ was an incarnation of love. He was love, living, breathing, speaking, amongst men. His birth was the nativity of love; his sermons, the word of love; his miracles, the wonders of love; his tears, the melting of love; his crucifixion, the agonies of love; his death, the sacrifice of love; and his resurrection, the triumph of love.

This is the impregnable fortress of a soul—all is at the disposal and command of my God; and my Father rules all—what need I fear? The soul trusting in God is prepared for all; and in the saddest apprehensions of the soul, beyond hope, believes against hope; even in the darkest night casts anchor in God—reposes on him when it sees no light.—Leighton.

Heap all the sweetest contentments and desirable enjoyments of the world upon a man, they will not make him a Christian; heap them upon a Christian, they will not make him a better Christian. Many a one hath been made worse by the good things of this world, and where is the Christian that hath been bettered by it?

The old city of Troy had but one gate. Go round and round the city, and you could find no other. If you wanted to get in, there was but one way, and no other. So to the strong and beautiful city of heaven there is but one gate, and no other. Do you know what it is? Christ says, "I am the door."

Ponder this shadow, O my soul, refresh thyself. If thy sins bar the hand of justice, behold thy sanctuary; if thy offences tremble before the Judge, behold thy Advocate; if thy creditor threaten a prison, behold thy bail, behold the Lamb of God that hath taken thy sins from thee.—Quarles.

"Infinite toil would not enable you to sweep away a mist; but by ascending a little you may often look over it altogether. So it is with our moral improvement; we wrestle fiercely with a vicious habit, which could have no hold upon us if we ascended into a higher moral atmosphere.—Helps.

As in nature, as in art, so in grace, it is rough treatment that gives gems, as well as stones, their lustre. The more the diamond is cut the brighter it sparkles; and in what seems hard dealing, there God has no end in view but to perfect his people.—Dr. Guthrie.

I am convinced that to spend any part of our time in feeding Christ's lambs, or binding the wounds of the weary ones of his flock, is not only our honor and privilege, but our greatest help to advancement in the Christian course.—Mary Lundie Duncan.

God save us from ourselves! We carry within us the elements of hell if we but choose to make them such. Ahaz, Judas, Nero, Borgia, Herod all were once prating infants in happy mother's arms.—Austin Phelps.

No man can succeed in all his undertakings, and it would not be well for him to do so. Things easily acquired go easily. It is by the struggle it costs to obtain that we learn to rightly estimate the value.

A religion that never suffices to govern a man will never suffice to save him. That which does not distinguish him from a sinful world will never distinguish him from a perishing world.—John Howe.

FIRST EASTER.

BY LILLIE E. BARR.

I pon that day, fairest of all days,
When first the skies thrilled to the Easter sun,
And angels and archangels bowed in praise
For marvelous victory by the Lord Christ won,
What songs had earth?
What joyful mirth?
What ohlument sweet
For those pierced feet?
Did not all nations listen with rapt ears
And kingdomless Jerusalem with tears?

No sound of shouting men, with victor's palms,
No singing maidens with triumphant lay,
No splendid priests with offerings and psalms,
Went forth to keep with Christ first Easter day.
Poor Mary's sigh,
Her joyful cry,
Her tiding feet,
Her message sweet
Unto the brethren in their bitter need:
The Lord is risen! The Lord is risen, indeed!"

This was the pealing song, the Easter cry,
The thunder in the trumpets that should blow
The joyful news to lands both far and nigh,
Till every sky with Easter light shall glow!
And every race
Know Easter grace,
In every tongue
Be sweetly sung
The Easter song that Mary still doth lead
"The Lord is risen! The Lord is risen, indeed!"

All dear and dumb! Paphos loved Venus then;
Delphi—nor Delos in its Ægean home;
Nor Greece, the land of gods and godlike men
Nor sage nor augur in Imperial Rome
Knew Easter day.
They brought no bay;
Honey nor fire
Nor rich attire,
Pale wines, or bruised myrrh, for offering
Unto Lord Christ, the Unknown God and King.

Nay, even Zion who last sinding prayed
Kept smoking temples pleading with the skies
And priests who on the altar's time laid,
Unmindful of the risen sacrifice.
And Tyre pale,
And riven vail,
And Gentile fear
In holy place,
And empty cross amid that awful gloom,
And soldiers watching by that empty tomb.

Sunday-School Lesson.

FOR THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Second Quarter Lesson V.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost."—Luke xv, 6.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1881.—LUKE XV, 1-10.

1. Then drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners for to hear him.

2. And the Pharisees and scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them.

3. And he spake this parable unto them, saying,

4. What man of you having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it?

5. And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing.

6. And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost.

7. I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance.

8. Either what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it?

9. And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbors together, saying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost.

10. Likewise, I say unto you, There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

Peschel. Then drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners for to hear him.

This period of Christ's ministry was one of favor with publicans and sinners, and of bitter and openly avowed opposition and dislike to the church party. Christ was, in the best sense of the term, an attractive preacher. He drew all men unto him by the gracious words of his lips. The publicans were the tax gatherers of Palestine, a class of men who, by their very occupation, were usually corrupt and universally detested. They were inferior officers, employed to collect Roman taxes. They were required to pay over to their superiors the exorbitant sum fixed by the law, and depended for their profit on what they could make by fraud and extortion. They overcharged, brought false charges of smuggling, to extort hush-money, seized upon property in case of dispute, and held it until their levy was paid. They were feared, hated and despised throughout Palestine. The Talmud classed them among thieves and assassins, and regarded their repentance impossible. No money known to have come from them would be used for religious purposes.

These publicans were like the revenue officers that infested the country just after the close of the war, confiscating sugar and property of all sorts. One who, by his extortion and fraud, was ostracised, attempted to make friends with the people in the village where he lived by presenting the church with an organ. The organ was thrown into the streets when it was known that the publican's money bought it. Publicans still live, and are still hated. The sinners were not the merely ceremonial unclean, just not members of the church, for the mere sinner in those days was not so honorable a name as in these days; the term sinner meant the outcasts of society, the openly wicked, who were not only sinners, but foreigners, Gentiles, which in the eyes of the church was the greater crime.

Is it any wonder that in this caste-ridden country, where the aristocracy looked with hatred and disdain on the masses of their own nation, and with bitter contempt upon all foreigners, that the suffering multitudes should have drawn near to hear Jesus, who in his gracious words ignored all baleful prejudices, and taught the sunken and hopeless to respect themselves still by showing them that he at least had hope of them in spite of their sins and misery.

That which attracted the publicans and sinners, and made them hail Jesus with enthusiasm, also attracted the attention of the murmurers, and made them murmur, "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them."

That Jesus should outrage the established laws of privilege and exclusiveness by allowing those to follow him whom Rabbis would not allow to approach them, and, still worse, by receiving them kindly and eating with them, was a bitter offense to the Pharisees and scribes. The charge was strictly true. He did receive sinners, and ate with them.

The Lord is indeed one who receives sinners. He receives them to pardon them, to sanctify them, to make them meet for heaven. He came to seek and save that which was lost. He is like his Father and our Father in that he receiveth sinners. "Come now, let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

All over the land it ran, from mouth to mouth, that for the first time a great Rabbi had appeared who was no respecter of persons, but let himself be anointed by a woman that was a sinner, sat in the booth with a hated publican, and mingled freely in the market-place with the crowds, whose very neighborhood to some is pollution.

Christ did not gain favor with unholy men by making their sins lighter than the scribes had represented them to be; he made them heavier. He did not convey the idea that their sins were easily forgiven, but he fixed in their hearts the impression that God is a great forgiver.

"The Pharisees and scribes murmured." Blessed to you and me those murmurs, drawing forth, as they do on all occasions, priceless words of hope and comfort. In vindication of his conduct, and in answer to the charge of too great friendliness to sinners and too much neglect of themselves, he spoke this parable unto them. "What man of you," etc. It is as if our Lord had said: Would not man do all this for a sheep, how much more would God do all this for a man. By saying "What man of you" he turns his argument directly upon his accusers. It is an appeal to human nature in vindication of divine nature, as the logicians call it an argument ad hominem, to the man. It is an appeal to common sense, an appeal to consciousness, the very last court of appeals. I am but doing what you would do and feel right in doing. I am doing what God would do. Can you see anything to murmur at in the action of the man who lost one of his sheep, and went after it until he found it? It is natural and right that he should rejoice when he found it. Is there anything wrong in his putting the ninety and nine in the fold, and for a while, so to speak, forgetting them, and losing sight of them in his great anxiety for the one lost, I appeal to your own hearts. If he had not done just as he did you would have blamed him. The very relationship he sustained to the sheep, as owner and shepherd, made him do just as he did. The sheep was his own, and he was the shepherd; he was not a hireling, whose the sheep are not. Well, just so: I tell you there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine, just persons that need no repentance.

"Either what woman," etc. What woman is there among you who, having lost one of the coins on her necklace, will not light a candle and seek until she finds it. Of course she will, and do right in so doing. It is hers, and she values it for its worth, and because it is a part of her adornment. She will not feel her loss less because she has nine pieces left. Her conduct is what we might expect.

Likewise in heaven, the angels are called on to rejoice with God at the repentance and salvation of a sinner. The souls of men are his jewels. He counts them. The angels rejoice because God rejoices. To him they owe their bliss. The lesson is God's regard for a penitent sinner, growing out of his relation to the sinner as Creator, preserver, shepherd. The Lord is my shepherd, owner, Father of my spirit. Not the ministry of angels; this is not taught here any more than it is said that the friends of the man helped to find the sheep, or the friends of the woman helped to find the coin; they only rejoiced with the finder that he had found.

The incident is full of truths to us. We learn Christ is the friend of all who need a friend. God is our owner, our shepherd, our Father, but we are not sheep or senseless values, but are living men, with conscious souls, stamped with God's image, and therefore his; but the blessings of these high relationships are only ours when we recognize them, and claim by confessing our sins and repenting the benefits of this relationship. We may go down to hell, and yet sustain these relations to God. The sheep that are lost are the shepherd's; the souls that are lost are God's. The mere relation we sustain to our heavenly Father, through his love and preventing grace, will not save us except we repent.

God wants all men to be saved, with an intense desire, yet many are lost.

Why Don't He Come?

Let us notice this question and consider the answer. It is asked by a young bride, as she sits beside the open door, in the evening twilight, watching for the approach of him to whom, but a few weeks since, she gave her hand and heart, and, with the fervor of woman's devotion, entrusted her whole life's happiness. Twilight deepens, the shadows fall, and darkness settles around her. Affrighted, disconsolate and alone, she watches and longs for the coming of him she loves. Hours of loneliness thus passby, and at last he comes, but his step is tottering, his words incoherent and his eye is red. He has no caresses for his bride, no expressions of love for her yearning heart. There is a weight upon his brain, a strangeness in his manner, a stupor upon his powers, and soon he is unconscious. As that fair young woman sits beside him, in mute astonishment, and with woman's tenderness bathes his burning brow, and gazes upon his prostrate form, she reads, in the scene before her, the answer to her oft-repeated question. He delayed his coming to worship at the shrine of Bacchus; he tarried "long at the wine." With an anguish indescribable, she says: "The man I thought so noble and good, whom I have trusted and loved, has deceived me. I am ruined. I am a drunkard's wife."

Why don't he come? is asked by the mother, as she spreads the table for the evening repast, and a group of smiling, happy children listen for the sound of papa's footsteps, ready to meet him at his coming, and greet him with a kiss. But they wait in vain. Tired out at last, the little heads droop, the evening prayer is said, and again repeating, "Why don't he come," and, without papa's good-night kiss, the gentle mother lays them down to rest, and soon they are asleep. But the mother sleeps not; her heart is too full, and, with the charity of a wife's love, she seeks for a plausible reason for the delay. Late at night, supported by those who have tempted and disgraced him, he reels, half unconscious, to his own door, and soon finds rest in the drunkard's sleep.

Surprised and terror-stricken, the wife now understands all. That debased man, who lies before her, has been a faithful, loving husband and a tender father to her children, but the scene is changed. The vender of ardent spirits has offered the fatal cup, the subtle power of temptation has become too strong, that once noble man has fallen, the "beverage of hell" has entered that household, and that happy family is ruined. Their property is swept away, the children in rags and hunger fly in terror from a brutish father, and the wife, dreading his approach, his curse and abuse, with all her hopes blasted, without food or clothing, finally, with her spirit crushed, settles down to the despairing wretchedness of the drunkard's wife, and is at last driven from the wretched hovel she calls home, or falls by the hand of him who promised to "comfort and love" her, the murdered wife of a drunkard. This picture is but too often realized in the experience of thousands in our land. Intemperance is an appalling evil. It fosters ignorance, imbolence, pauperism and crime. It increases our taxes, destroys our property, corrupts our morals, fills our parish and State prisons with criminals, murders our citizens, and clothes thousands of our people in the habiliments of woe. The manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors has largely increased within the last few years, and so in proportion has the use of them, with all the attendant evils, and bids fair, unless restrained, to involve us, as a people, in financial and moral ruin.

A people have the right to free themselves from this gorgon of evil, and they ought to do it. The press, the pulpit, the people in mass, all parties and systems of reform, should unite here, and attack it as a common foe, and avail themselves of all laudable means to hurt it from them. They should use the ballot-box as the strong arm of right, and say to the dram-seller: You shall not tempt the young, degrade society, murder our people by this wicked traffic. We need not the intoxicating cup, with its debasing, corrupting influences, and from its dreadful power we can and we will be free.

MR. EDITOR: Your editorial, leader, in the ADVOCATE of March 19 I have just read, and I feel impelled to ask a few questions. The salient point of the article is that the conviction which thorough regeneration and sanctification of our nature, character and life dissiderate, is the conviction that there is thorough natural (moral and spiritual I suppose you to mean) corruption or depravity, out of which each is individually to be saved. You say that the conscience outlives to bring reprehension to the soul for acts of sin, but that aback of all this conviction of the naturally depraved condition of the heart is to be had, and that this conviction is to be wrought through a proper concept of the doctrine as it is taught in the Scriptures, and by the operation of the Holy Spirit. I choose to give your position in my own words rather than, by quotation of parts of your article, chipping it up. It is not controversy I seek, but conference. That is distinctive of Methodism. The term conference is a most significant one. First, I would respectfully ask, Is the conviction to be wrought concerning our natural depravity to be wrought simply upon the judgment intellectually? Or does the conviction vibrate the moral sense? Does it involve the conscience? Is it possible for a moral agent to feel guilty because of a conditioning of his being or of his nature, said conditioning being consequence of no act, choice, wish or neglect of his? Second, Is it so clearly taught in the Holy Scriptures That there is no gracious conditioning of the soul through or by nexus with the word—the Logos—from the genesis of our individual, personal being?

Third. In view of the accepted theory that Adam was "created in righteousness and true holiness," and therefore had no prompting from the conditioning of his nature to transgress, yet, nevertheless, sinned, are we not necessarily foiled in finding in the natural condition of a moral agent the ground, cause, occasion or reason of his disobedience—his sin? The pivotal point, upon which turns man's responsibility, is will, and not a condition of his nature aback of his will. Will is a term declarative of freedom of mind. It is ultimate, in moral government; a reason for which no reason may be given, a cause and not an effect; a somewhat inexplicable but not at all perplexing. To say free will is to speak tautologically. It is as if one were to say a round circle.

Fourth. Is it in contravention of our Methodist dixy to say that the article of faith which declares that such is the natural condition of man after the fall that he cannot turn himself to faith and good works without the grace of God preventing him, is tantamount to saying that a space cannot be inclosed upon a surface without straight or curved lines? A graceless soul has never come into life. The kingdom of God is catholic. Every segment of the circle of humanity is coincident with the circle of redeeming love, life and power.

Fifth. May we not consider that the invariably loyal and conservative instinct of genuine reform spring the first Methodist theological writers—Wesley, Watson, Clarke and Fletcher—to adjust their teaching to the orthodoxy of their day? That through their powerful thought, under inspiration of God, there was a signal thaw from a stiff old Calvinistic freeze, but that the product was rather slush than clear, limpid, running water? That, under divine guidance and stimulous mind of this day, many have as immediate access to the primal, ultimate conditions of these questions as had mind in the day of the Methodist fathers? To take anything at second hand, and act and speak as attorney therefor, ofttimes finally foils one in effort to reach the highest intellectual and moral manhood.

I have never known a hen to lay rotten eggs. God seems to be eternally aback of nature and the devil, securing to us sound seed for forests, fields and flower beds, and, according to this analogy, I can but conclude that nature and the devil have hardly wrenched out of his hand so great a matter as the origin and conditioning of such as are to bear his image. The finger touch of divinely regenerative power, qualifying the soul for all which obliges it, may just as well come in at the genesis of individual being as at some future time, for it, at last or at first, enables. Indeed, the whole theory of a Christian, catholic cultus, wherein or whereby children may be brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, is implicative of this doctrine of prevenient antedating grace, but of a Christian infancy we are to secure a Christian boyhood and girlhood, and from these a Christian manhood. Our Methodist preachers are too often spinning their limbs against Calvinistic breakers, as they essay to swim in our theological waters. To take a dogma which has been phrased to our lips, and endeavor to make it available to experience by stress of mind of effort to appropriate it, is of the nature of will worship, and one may write or speak with no little force on behalf of such conceit, but it were as well to expect an American eagle, hatched from a porcelain egg, as to look for life, vigor and genial influence from mind thus perverted in its method. It is our privilege and our salvation to look at things rather than at what men have written about them. Most authors have written about things. A few have written things.

BY A. M. JONES.

"SHE WEEP FOR JOY."

The community was thinly populated, and I had traveled miles without seeing either man, woman or child. This gave my vocal organs a little rest, and afforded a good opportunity for reflection. My reverie, however, was suddenly arrested as an opening appeared in the forest, and a building was seen at the head of a hollow, a quarter of a mile to the left. Not being able to find a road, my horses, as best they could, made their way through the woods, and around logs, brush and trees. The house was simply a small log hut, with one room, surrounded by a low rail fence, enclosing the yard. Everything about the place presented the appearance of the most extreme poverty. The lady was of middle age, delicate and pale, with a sad, sorrowful face. She was plainly though neatly dressed, conversed well, and evidently had seen better days. On learning my business she seemed to become embarrassed, and said: "You may think it strange, but we have not had a Bible of our own in the house for years. When we began house-keeping we had one, but when my husband started to the army I insisted on his taking it, intending to get another as soon as I went to town. From time to time I made the effort, but failed, and do not believe there has been a Bible in the community for sale from that day to the present. My husband never returned, but died in less than a year. He left me a good home and plenty of property, but on account of some indebtedness, when the war closed, it was all swept away. I was left among strangers, with five little children, the youngest not three years old, in a destitute condition. How we were to get along and keep from starving I could not imagine. And I tell you we have seen hard times; but the good Lord has taken care of us. In this country there are no school advantages, but, teaching at home, my children have learned to read, write, and know something of figures. Of course I miss the Bible, having been taught to read and respect it from my childhood. Would not have been without one so long if any of the merchants in the community had kept them for sale. Would be glad to take one of these now if I had the money. If you will call here next week I will be sure to take one, as my daughter is weaving a piece of cloth for one of our neighbors, and will receive the pay as soon as it is finished." Being touched with her simple, earnest story, I said, "Madam, will you accept this Bible?" at the same time presenting her a nice book, worth sixty cents. She hesitated, but finally took it, while the tears came into her eyes. "I appreciate your kindness," she continued, "and am truly grateful, but you must excuse me; I cannot accept it without paying you." I insisted and told her that I did not want her money, and would not take it. "I will keep it," she replied, "if you will call next week and get the money; we will have it then." Having explained the benevolent nature of the American Bible Society, and that it was my duty to leave a Bible in the home of every family in the condition of hers, she burst into tears, pressed the Bible to her heart, and said: "God bless the Bible Society for sending me this precious treasure, and God bless you, sir, for bringing it to my humble home. My daughter will be delighted." She reads the Bible every chance she has, and keeps one borrowed when she can. I want it more on her account than my own. I feel grateful to God to this day for the privilege of placing the Bible in that good woman's hands.

The Cause.

MR. EDITOR: I submit a few reflections suggested by the article of Bro. H. on "Emigration and Immigration," and by your own on "The negro in missing." Bro. H. has manifestly spoken a question in sociology of vital interest to us all, a question addressing itself to the home-life of every one, and to the well being of the body politic as well. The discontent of our people is fearful in depth and extent, and is productive of much individual and social disquietude and unhappiness. His California case is as familiar to us as to him, and is only one of many similar cases that have passed under our observation.

As viewed from our stand-point many causes of this unhappy state of society exist in our country. The present may not aptly be considered the transition period in the history of American society, political, social and religious. We, as a people, are just emerging from the gloom, despondency, darkness and blood of the most titanic interpecine slaughter that ever crimsoned the page of the historic muse. But yesterday, and the red hoof of battle marked the soil from Maine to Mexico, and the entire country was swept as by a devouring tempest. During this bloody national tragedy old principles, heavy headed and grey-bearded, trains hitherto regarded self-evident, customs and habits of society long revered, and political principles transmitted from through patriotic veins and the smoke of many a hard-fought battle-field, and by us regarded as sacred as the life-blood of the Republic, were all slain and now lie buried beneath the rubbish of the past; and all true lovers of our country as it was, are left to awaken the Hamerlic muse and sing.

"Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring, (Ten woes unnumbered, heaven'ly goddess, sing!"

Herein is to be found the opening chapter of the iliad of all our woes. When Troy fell the sons of Priam wept. What the final result of this grand demolition will be, is and yet apparent upon the surface. We know one thing, it has opened up to the mind of the suffering country a new plain of thought, a new theater of activities, and is called by the Victor Progress, and by the vanquished Ruin. History fails to tell us of a people contented, happy, while in transitu. The great American mind is, at present, unsettled; and as regards the future of the country, may be fitly symbolized by that of the seers when said of them, "All men musing in their minds if he be the Christ."

POSTMASTER.

SIGNOR GAVAZZI, referring to his lectures, recently, observed that he had not spoken from MS. since 1848. "I must," he said, "adapt what I say to my audience. If I am lecturing to an auditience of quiet, sedate people, I talk in a sober, sedate manner; but if the people are young, and like spirit and fun, why, I talk in a lively manner. That's the best way. Besides, if I had but one speech, and some one should hear it the second time, he would say: 'He is out very smart. He has but one lecture for all.'"

—The National Bible Society of Scotland put in circulation last year 141,864 Bibles, 151,986 Testaments, and 130,817 portions of Scripture.

Obituaries.

HARVEY.—Died, very suddenly, at one o'clock A. M., March 31, Mrs. Lydia S. Harvey, aged 49 years, 8 months and 1 day.

Sister Harvey was the daughter of Thomas and Sarah Miles, of this place; was, formerly, the widow of William Thorn; on the seventeenth day of May, 1850, was married to Mr. Geo. Harvey, who now sorrows with other friends, "not as they have no hope." She had been a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, several years, and in death proved the truth of the saying, "that our people die well." She talked calmly of death, saying all she regretted was the leaving her friends. She left a good-bye for her brothers and sisters, telling them all to do right and try to meet her in heaven. May her children, of the Master's call, stand as a call to her other friends, to "be also ready." At four P. M. the same day the bell tolled, and we followed her remains to the church, where we had a short funeral service, when we were summoned to the burial of Sister Mariloe A. Gieger, wife of Mr. Conrad Gieger, and wife of Mathias Gieger. Turning from us, without the closing scene of a triumphant death. She spoke calmly and trustingly of the Saviour, fully evincing the power of religion to cheer the valley of death.

Sister Gieger was the daughter of Wm. [illegible] and was born September 24, 1835. She leaves a husband and seven small children, with many friends, to mourn her departure.

This is one day (two) of our members at least, prevailed away. May we all take warning and be ready when the Master calls for us.

GAINES.—Eugene P., only son of M. Chaney and Geo. H. Gaines, was born at Pearl river, La., February 14, 1881; aged 2 years, five months and twenty-one days.

This is one of the saddest trials which can happen to the bereaved parents. A few months or little girl, sister to the deceased, was cruelly called to death, and now their home, full of youth and promise, has found a vacancy, leaving the disconsolate parents but a step to render the calamity, if possible, more severe. His father was absent at the Univ. of Tenn., New Orleans, and as he was returning home the welcome of his loved ones he heard of the distressing message that he would see no more on earth the greeting smile of his darling boy, his fond companion ever since [illegible] walk. The afflicted father pathetically said: "The little angels sabble, the whip that [illegible] gallop against the wall, the neighing of the [illegible] his strong little gun, his unused ax and tool [illegible] fill me more forcibly than words, that a [illegible] leader, architect and laborer has gone [illegible] grave" and adds: "Our crushed and bleeding [illegible] would know no healing but for the glorious [illegible] immortality and eternal life."

His father also states that he was devoted [illegible] prayed night and morning, and the day before [illegible] she requested his mother to read the sixth chapter of St. John, of Christ walking on the water, and after words delivered her favorite Psalm, the one hundred and third, and chose there rested then upon his gentle [illegible] thus foreshadowing of his coming and that his agonizing parents may have grace [illegible] patiently to hear the chastenings of the Lord, [illegible] body trust to adopt the language of the [illegible] say: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all [illegible] within me bless his holy name." "What I [illegible] know not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

MILLER.—My dear sister, Mrs. [illegible] Miller, was born December 12, 18[illegible] Rockport, Copiah county, Miss., joined the [illegible] Episcopal Church in early womanhood, [illegible] died near David's, Miller August 17, 18[illegible] her husband to Covington county, where [illegible] united but a short time, returned to [illegible] settled near my father's, where they were [illegible] the time of her death, February 26, 1881, aged [illegible] three years, two months and eight days.

[illegible] manner of life from youth, was [illegible] retired. In her own quiet, gentle way [illegible] tried to improve the gifts which God [illegible] had committed to her care. She lived, [illegible] obeyed him to the best of her ability [illegible] desire of her devotion to God, religion [illegible] Christian piety, she was ever anxious [illegible] church and Sunday school, and dearly [illegible] with kind and helping hand to the needy [illegible] feeling. To these beautiful traits of character [illegible] who knew her best can testify.

Her death was a sad one indeed. It [illegible] that she died from an attack of [illegible] of all alone; no loved one present [illegible] to cool and to shed a tear of sympathy, [illegible] message, not even to witness her [illegible] death. Died alone! No, no, not alone, for [illegible] angels come and filled her love chamber [illegible] glorious presence, and received her [illegible] and wafted it away, upon their snowy [illegible] immortal home.

She leaves a young husband, an aged [illegible] brothers and five sisters, and many friends [illegible] her loss. Besides these, she has left a precious [illegible] boy, only a few months old.

RAINSVILLE.—Sister Laura [illegible] Rainsville was born in Washington county, Miss., in 1826 or 27, and died in Green county, Miss., March 22, 1881. She was the daughter of Isaac Tuck. She was married to Robert Rainsville January [illegible] Sister Rainsville made a profession of religion early in life and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, afterwards the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in which she lived and died an acceptable member. She was a woman full of energy, looking well to the interests of her family and those with whom she had anything to do. However, she did not neglect her spiritual welfare and that of her children, as she was the mother of three sons and five daughters, all of whom she had dedicated to God in early infancy by baptism. Two of them preceded her to the mansions above.

She was a child of affliction and suffering, having had three attacks of pneumonia, by which her constitution became a wreck, and an easy prey to consumption, of which she died. Testifying to all around that religion was not a vain thing; it proved a comfort and consolation in her hour of affliction, and all was peaceful and triumphant in death. Now she is gone from us for a season; our loss is her gain. She said to loved ones, "Meet me and greet me in heaven." "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

EASTER CAROL.

BY ALEX. H. THOMPSON, D. D.

Come to the tomb,
In the early gloom
Of the shar-lit Easter morning;
The cavern lone,
With its sealed stone,
And the garden flowers adorning.
Last night it lay
In the dying day,
With its harried treasure sleeping;
And soldiers grim
In the evening dim,
Their vigilant guard were keeping.

Woe for the hour
Of his murderer's power!
Their work on the rough cross ended,
Love brought him here,
On a tear-wet bier;
O'er which faith and fear contended.
Ere break of day,
To noiselot the clay
Of its murdered master curling,
Love comes again,
With a dreary pain,
In its hands sweet spices bearing.

Across the stars
Lie the level bars
Of the morning light just breaking;
And all the flowers,
Wet with soft dew showers,
In the twilight dawn are waking.
He is not here!
Is it hope or fear?
'Tis a holy, heavenly wonder
Down in the gloom
Of the Master's tomb,
Of the shining angels yonder

See on the floor,
Through the open door,
Where love laid him down with weeping,
The grave clothes lie,
Where he tossed them by
When he wakened from his sleeping.
He is arisen
From the grave's dark prison;
Lord Lord of the dead and living!
Fall at his feet
And the warrior greet,
All honor and glory giving!

The sun casts down
His resplendent crown
On radiant light for the hiring,
And birds and flowers,
In a thousand towers,
With beauty and song adore him.
The light is won
By the champion
And the angels come to meet him,
With them we cry,
And "Rabboni" cry,
And fall at his feet and greet him.

Our Pulpit.

One Day at a Time.

BY REV. O. P. FITZGERALD, D. D.

...ould is the birthright of human ... and death is the end. The world ... ugo to its goal through agonies, ... tears and blood. So it has been, so ... and so it must be, until out of the ... ss of this dispensation shall burst ... daybreak of the millennial morn. ... Every period of human life has its ... har troubles—infancy, childhood, ... th, middle age, and old age. All life ... profusion every part of it, each ... r each month, each week, each day. ... Discipline of trouble enters into ... s purpose and plan. You ask why? ... s useless to speculate. It is a practi... fact, and we must deal with it as such. ... our Lord deals with it here. Evil ... y be expected: take it as it comes; ... not increase the evils of to-day by ... epting those that may come to-... row. This is the philosophy of the ... by which our Lord would save his ... ples from a pernicious error that ... bles spiritual life and banishes its ...

This habit of foreboding evil is so ... mon that we need not wonder that ... Lord should thus make it the sub... of a special warning. It is so des... ctive of the best elements of the ... stian life that it will not be a waste ... ss to consider its nature, ... uses, and its remedy.

Its nature: It is a painful habit, ... misfortunes that afflict us most are ... e that never happen.

It is a growing habit. The evils, like ... pleasures of the imagination, are ... limitable as the wonderful faculty ... which they owe their existence. The ... per regulation of this faculty is too ... le considered by Christians. In its ... pective influence and results the ... ld of the imagination is a real world, ... fully or gloriously real, as it is ... perly or rightly used. It makes a ... ven of holiness and peace or a hell ... ill and misery. Look well to it. This ... ul recesses by indulgence. A man ... s become an inveterate croaker, a ... ptual whiner, before he knows it. ... appy to himself, disagreeable to ... ers, offensive to God.

This habit is contagious. One thor... ly croaker can paralyze the hope and ... ergy of an entire church. The com... ning, fearful, desponding member ... a household can cast a shadow of ... ness over all the others. The atmos... re of such persons is smothering. ... e a half hours' talk with one of ... unhappy temper, you feel as if you ... ust to go out into the fresh air, look ... the sun, take a deep breath, shake ... rself, and throw off the weight of ... presence. He darkens daylight and ... ks gloom.

This habit discourages effort to do ... d get good. He that has no hope will ... ke no exertion. Nursing his mor... fancies, he lets the richest opportu... ties pass by unimproved. He loses ... the motivation and the ability for ... ing. Like plants shut up in the dark, ... soul enveloped in the gloom of evil ... eluding will grow sickly and perish. ... The causes of this unhappy dis... sition will be considered.

Some persons are constitutionally ... ponding. It is their sluggish blood. ... ey were born so, and organic tend... ies of this sort are never wholly eradi... ted in this life. They are to be classed ... h those infirmities of which the holy ... stle, to whom they were no stran... , speaks with so much tenderness: ... ey belong to the natural body, and ... l he laid aside with it when death ... ll be swallowed up in victory—

"And flesh and sense no more control
The sacred pleasures of the soul."

Sometimes this despondling habit ... the result of bad health. All sensible ... ysicians have reference to this fact ... their treatment of bodily disease. ... e minister of the gospel, who has ... deal with the maladies of the soul ... t lie deeper within, should not for... it. Jesus made the bodily heal... the basis and precursor of the spiri... l in all cases. Though lacking his ... racle-working power, we can hum... follow his method.

But in all cases where it is sinful, lack of faith in God is the cause of this habit of foreboding evil. Faith in God involves belief in his being, and reli... nce upon his power, wisdom and good... ss. God knows what is best for his creatures; he is able to do all things according to the counsel of his own will; his goodness will cause him to will what is best.

III. In finding the causes we discover the remedy for this evil habit or disposition of mind.

1. That which is the result of physical causes must be treated accordingly.

2. That which is the result of constitutional melancholy or despondency must be borne with patiently, but may be mitigated by the remembrance that the great Physician, Shepherd, and Bishop of souls makes due allowance for natural predispositions; he knoweth our frames, and remembereth that we are dust. He is touched with the feeling of our infirmities—not our willfulness, not our sinfulness, but those infirmities which spring from inherited conditions and invincible limitations.

3. That which results from defect of faith can only be remedied by increase of faith. The text and context present considerations which, properly understood, must have a tendency to produce the result, showing that the foreboding of evil is foolish and sinful.

The evils of our present are such as God permits. What he permits must be best. The path to glory is through tribulation. Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, was made perfect through suffering. If we would reach perfection, we must tread the same path. This life is a probation—every day of it. Therefore we must have our share of evil. This is the deep and solemn truth of the text. Be sure that each day will bring a sufficiency of trial—enough to test and develop faith and obedience, enough to discipline the will, enough to hallow the affections, enough to make heaven sure and sweet; sufficient for the accomplishment of God's gracious purpose of purification, growth, and final glorification of his trusting and obedient child.

Sufficient, but not more than sufficient, thank God. We shall not be tempted beyond our strength. With every temptation there will be found a way of escape. Sin and suffering reign, but grace abounds. Sufficient, but nothing more. This joyful truth completes the teaching of the text, and opens to the eye of faith the gate of heaven. All the evil of the present state is turned into the blessing here and hereafter, all things working together for good to them that love God.

Courage, my soul, thy bitter cross,
In every trial here,
Shall bear thee to thy heaven above
Ere shall not enter there."

The Class-Meeting.

It was by the special providence of God, I apprehend, that Mr. Wesley was led to sanction the weekly class meeting, as a means of religious edification. It was not, in the first instance, devised by him, but arose out of the religious yearnings of the people who were awakened and converted under his ministry, and that of his brother. These simple-minded people, just brought into a state of reconciliation with God, longed for Christian fellowship. They wanted to meet together, with other persons like-minded, that they might declare what the Lord had done for their souls, pray with and for each other, and by mutual consent promote each other's comfort and edification. It was not sufficient that they attended the ministry of the word, and approached the table of the Lord; they felt that they could not live without Christian fellowship. The same feeling prevailed in the primitive disciples. The converted people in Jerusalem, after the Pentecost, were "of one heart and of one soul;" they assembled in one another's houses; and "continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." The believers at Thessalonica "comforted" and edified" one another. The hearts of the Colossians, of the Laodiceans and of Christian people everywhere were "knit together in love." The Hebrews, who were "partakers of the heavenly calling," forsook not "the assembling of themselves together" for their mutual improvement in personal godliness and in good works. St. Peter spent some days and nights in the company of heathen soldiers; but it was because he was bound to them by a chain. As soon as he obtained his liberty, he went directly, as by a special instinct, "to the house of Mary, the mother of John, where many were gathered together praying." Peter and John were for a time imprisoned, and then arraigned as criminals in a court at Jerusalem; but "being let go, they went to their company." And so it always will be with spiritually-minded people. Theirs is not the religion of form, but of love; and it is the essence of love to unite all one. Hence the true philosophy of the class meeting. During a long life of observation, and especially during the forty years in which I myself had the charge of a class, I have invariably seen that, in exact proportion as the members are spiritually-minded and religiously in earnest, they prize these meetings, and delight to attend them; and as they become worldly in their disposition, and formal and lukewarm in the service of God, they are indifferent to these means of grace, and seek for excuses to justify their non-attendance. As to myself, I have found it to be a great benefit to be compelled, once a week at least, to review my past conduct, to inquire into the state of my heart with respect to God; and I have every reason to believe that at this day I am a better man than I should otherwise have been, in consequence of the weekly class meeting, which I have been accustomed to attend.—Rev. Toos. Jackson.

THE HUMAN FIGURE. The height of the human figure is six times the length of the foot. Whether the form is slender or plump, the rule holds good; any deviation from it is a departure from the highest beauty in proportion. The Greeks made all their statutes according to this rule. The face from the highest point of the forehead, where the hair begins, to the chin, is one-tenth of the whole statute. The hand, from the wrist to the end of the middle finger, is the same. From the top of the chest to the highest point of the forehead is the seventh. If the face, from the roots of the hair to the chin, be divided into three equal parts, the division determines the place where the eyebrows meet, and the second the nostrils. The height from the feet to the top of the head is the distance between the extremities of the fingers when the arms are extended.

A good place for "Gospel Temperance" is in Sunday-school. It is easier to save the children from becoming drunkards, than later to rescue them from drunkenness.

Religious Intelligence.

—A missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel writes from Basutoland that the Basuto war has broken up entirely missionary work at Thlotse Heights and scattered both European and native congregations to the winds. The following shows what serious effects this most wicked war, waged by the British rulers, had on British churches and missions:

"I am thankful to say that at this trying crisis not one of our native converts has joined the rebels. They have all proved loyal, and have had to suffer accordingly, having been promptly and effectually 'eaten up' by their rebellious and, at the present moment, prosperous brethren. Six of our mission huts have been sacked and four of them burned down by the insurgents. Our church has been loop-holed in every direction by the government and is now used as a barrack. The enemy has taken care not to spare it either, and the whole building is riddled with shot. Our school has shared a like fate. Our new native training college, only partially completed, has been leveled almost to its foundation, and all our walls have been thrown down, by the authorities, in order that the rebels might find no cover behind them. The garden of the native training college, upon which so much care has been expended by my brother priest, the Rev. R. K. Champernowne, and upon which we mainly depend for our supply of vegetables, has been completely destroyed, a troop of the Kimberly Light Horses being at present quartered in it. The season being unusually wet, and fuel being consequently scarce, the timber and galvanized iron which arrived a short time since for the roof of the native training college—most expensive articles in these regions—have been appropriated by the volunteers, and 30,000 of our unburnt bricks, which the iron used to cover are gently melting away. Even our little cemetery has not been spared, the walls having been thrown down and the gate carried off and chopped up for fuel. Fortunately we were able before the outbreak took place to remove some of our furniture and books to the Free State; but a great many of the things that still remained have been stolen by the rebels, and three of our four horses have shared the same fate."—New York Independent.

The following is an extract from Dr. Theodore Christlieb's work on Modern Missions, called "Protestant Foreign Missions:"

"This is the age of Universal Missions. Among the Pacific Islands whole groups of them have been almost entirely Christianized. In British East India—from Cape Colony to the Himmalayas—mission stations are more thickly studded than "that net-work of missions which, toward the end of the first century, encompassed the empire of Rome." The largest, and many of the smaller, islands of India's Archipelago possess the evangelical missions on the sea-coast and in the far interior. Burmah is almost Christian, and Siam is open to the gospel. All the ports and half the provinces of China are in contact with a chain of stations, and to her teeming population in Australia and other lands the gospel has been sent. In Japan there are several dozen missionary organizations. Even the Aborigines of Australia have heard the word of God. In the lands of Islam theological seminaries and medical missions have been established as new centers of evangelization. Palestine has several Protestant Churches, and schools. Africa is being entered from the north, south, east, and west, and civilization and Christianity are creeping into the very heart of the dark Continent. In North America the immense plains of the Hudson Bay Territory have been opened up to the gospel from Canada to the Pacific Ocean. In Central America and the West Indies, Protestant missions have spread from island to island; Whilst on the Mosquito Coast, in the opposite mainland of Honduras, and in British and Dutch Guiana, they are gaining and ever-firmer hold. Lastly, South America, from Pernambuco to Patagonia, and the Falkland Islands, and Terra del Fuego, are tinged with the dawning of the gospel, which has penetrated to the interior, to the territories on the Amazon, and even to the Indians of Brazil.

"It is not ten years since evangelical ministers were subject to imprisonment for preaching the gospel in France, but now the whole of France is open to evangelical laborers. Every one of the 36,000 communes is accessible to the preachers of the gospel, and in many of these communes the mayors preside at the meetings and introduce the preachers, some public hall being used for the purpose. This is true not only of the cities, but also of the provincial towns of France, and the people everywhere show an eagerness to listen to the preaching of a pure gospel. It is one of the most remarkable changes of our time."

—Rev. J. Inskip bears the following testimony to our missionaries in India: "But we wait to say, for the benefit of all concerned, that those who have a mere professional idea of the office of a Christian minister, and are in pursuit of worldly ease and emolument, would do well to pass by India. This is no place for them, as they themselves will admit if they ever should come here. We cordially, in all our experience and observation, have never witnessed such devotion to the work of God as we have seen here."

The Christian at Work says: "The Bishop of London held a service recently for the admission of the first merchant captain admitted by a bishop to the upper office of lay reader. Singularly enough, it is the first occasion, at least in modern times, in which a bishop has officially recognized the services to religion rendered by captains of merchant ships, who conduct divine service, hold Bible-classes, manage adult-schools, visit the sick and dying, and bury the dead at sea."

—The Rajah of Borneo has expressed his willingness to encourage missionary operations in his dominions. This opens a new and wide field for missionary labor. Borneo, with the possible exception of New Guinea, is the largest island in the world, Australia being considered a continent.

The Arch Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, Dr. O. H. Tiffany, pastor, on its recent missionary Sunday raised $1,400 for missions—an advance of $400 over last year.

—The Emperor of Brazil, in order to encourage the coming of Protestant missionaries into his dominions, has offered, it is said, to pay the expenses of their transportation.

A Chinese church was dedicated in Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, January 9. It is commodious and attractive, costing $10,700.

—There are reported 50,000 Christians in South Africa, where Dr. Moffat waited years for a conversion.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS.—The Wesleyan Conference of Australasia met in Adelaide in May.—Presbyterianism is strong in New Zealand. The synod of Otago and Southland reports 6,861 members and 8,432 scholars. —The first session of the Victorian Wesleyan Mixed Conference of ministers and laymen commenced on January 25. There were eighty-four representatives returned as elected, nearly all of whom were present.—The Wesleyan Conference, of South Australia, adjourned Jan. 31, after a session of twelve days in Adelaide. Sixty-one preachers received appointments. The first Sunday in August was set apart for the advocacy of temperance from the pulpit. The following action was taken: "That while recognizing the value of the class-meeting as a means of grace, this conference is of opinion that it is undesirable to retain it as the primary test of membership in the Wesleyan Methodist Church; and recommends to the General Conference: 1. That in future all applicants for membership should be received on a public profession of faith in Christ, be entered on the church roll, and be placed under suitable leaders for Christian fellowship. 2. That membership should be forfeited when it is proved to the satisfaction of the leaders' meeting that there has been habitual neglect of the various means of grace in connection with the church, or inconsistent conduct." The General Conference was also recommended to adopt the American order for the reception of members. A report on church property, showed that there were in the colony 224 churches and five in course of erection. The cost of erecting the churches had been £205,361, being an increase of £36,925 in the last four years. The number of members, and members on trial, was read as follows: Full members, 5,078; on trial, 672; being an increase upon the last year of 136 full members, and 287 on trial. Seven ministerial and eight delegates to the General Conference were elected. Wesleyan Christian Advocate.

—The Broadway Tabernacle series of May meetings, which will occupy the week from the 8th to the 15th of the month, has been arranged. The following organizations will participate, and in the order here given: May 8, American Home Missionary Society; May 9, Woman's National Christian Temperance Union; New York Port Society, May 10; New York Sunday-school Association; National Temperance society, May 11; American Female Guardian Society; American Tract Society, May 12, New York Institution for the Instruction of Deaf and Dumb; New York Bible Society, May 13, New York Society for Prevention of Crime; Foreign Sunday-school Association, May 15, American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Announcement of the hours of meeting and names of speakers will be made hereafter. From Committee of Arrangements. H. L. STIMSON, Chairman.

During the time in which the Old Catholic body existed in Europe, now ten years, it has grown, according to the Church Quarterly Review from fourteen men who met at Nuremberg in 1870 to protest against the latest Papal innovations upon the Catholic faith, to a church consisting of two bishops, 120 priests, and upwards of 100,000 enrolled lay members, with adherents, more or less closely attached, amounting to three times that number. The greatest progress has been made in Germany and Switzerland, but small detachments from the main body are found in Austria and France.

—The Catholic press claims an increase of Catholics against state schools in Belgium. In the province of Antwerp they have 53,159 children and 13,146 infants in their schools. In the province of Limbourg they have in all 26,881, against 7,526 in the state schools. The Jesuits have in Belgium twelve colleges, in which there were 4,105 students at the beginning of the scholastic year; of these, 1,362 are in the elementary classes.

—The pastors of the New York East Conference, at a recent meeting in Seventh Street Church, passed a resolution requesting the bishop who is to preside at the coming session not to transfer ministers into their body without removing an equal number of ministers of like grade to other Conferences.

—Rev. Mr. Marshall, a Baptist missionary, writes to the Lucknow Witness that in Orissa 300 Hindoos have renounced caste and become Christians. There are among the 300 many of the highest caste, and of considerable wealth.

The Young Men's Christian Association has arranged with some of the Chicago pastors for sermons especially addressed to medical students, of whom there are about one thousand in that city.

—A special meeting of the Moravian Synod for the Northern District of the American Province is called for May of this year, at Bethlehem. The regular session of the Synod occurs in 1883. This meeting is called to consider pressing financial questions.

—A number of Chinese have for several years attended a United Presbyterian Church and Sabbath-school in Allegheny City, Penn., and have become greatly endeared to the pastor and Sabbath-school teachers.

The colored Baptists of Texas, Arkansas and Northern Louisiana numbering about 100,000, purpose to build a college at Marshall, Texas, for the education of ministers and teachers.

According to the National Baptist, there are 60 Baptist Churches in Philadelphia; being one to every 14,697 of population. These churches have 16,... members, being one to every 18.

—Three hundred Mohammedan girls, in their own language, says Dr. Jessup, of Syria, sang the hymn "My faith looks up to Thee."

A church is to be built at Isandula, South Africa, in memory of the men who fell in the battle at that place.

The late ex-Governor A. W. Bradford, of Maryland, was a devoted member of Mt. Vernon Place Methodist E. Church, Baltimore.

St. John's Episcopal Congregation, Dundee, Scotland, has unanimously voted to secede to the Reformed Episcopal Church, Bishop Gregg's branch.

The Annual Conference of the Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints, held near Council Bluffs, was attended by 2000 members.

There were 105 new Congregational Churches organized in the United States during 1880, and 205 ministers ordained or installed.

Rev. Aaron Perkins (Baptist), over ninety, has just preached his seventieth anniversary sermon at Jersey City.

There are 339 Unitarian Churches in the United States and Canada, and 401 ministers, four of them women.

There are 449 clergymen resident in Brooklyn, N. Y.

A STORY RETOLD.

BY ANNE EMILIE PURCHASON.

Christ is risen! hear child, listen
To a legend told;
'Tis a sweet, quaint Easter story,
Years ago 'twas told.
I, a little child like you;
Loved to think the story true.

When the Saviour's suffering ended
In death's welcome rest,
Lovingly the pierced body
For the grave was dressed,
And to sepulchre was taken,
Where none never yet had lain.

Very lovely was that graveyard,
Very fair to see;
Beautiful with bloom and verdure
One close growing tree,
Stretching greenness for shade,
Clad the tomb with shadows soft.

Very early in the morning,
While it yet was dark;
When no moon shone in the garden,
Nor yet starry spark,
In the the early morning gloom,
Rose our dear Lord from the tomb.

Angels bright in shining garments;
Rolled away the stone
Seal of death they could not open,
Christ the Lord alone
Then, as now, that seal could break,
To new life the dead awake.

As he rose from rocky prison,
One wee bird above,
In the sheltering green branches,
Met his look of love.
Quick responsive to that look
Forth the joyous music broke,

Praise more glad, or music sweeter,
Sure was never heard,
Than this first of Easter anthems
Caroled by a bird!
And Christ listening to the lay
Blessed the little bird alway.

That all Christians might remember,
Through the ages long,
This the blessing for that joyous
Resurrection Song;
That the bird's white eggs should change
Many colored, bright and strange.

And, dear child, the legend sayeth,
Eggs, for Easter Day,
Still are colored, by that blessing,
In some magic way;
Showing us our God of love
E'en a bird's song will approve.

Wide Awake.

Lost Boy.

Many bright lights were shining from the windows of dwellings scattered among the hills and valleys of Pennsylvania one chilly night. In a small house, standing alone in the great forest some miles from any other, the light did not go out the whole long night; for from that home a little three-year old boy had strayed away, and he could not be found.

The news soon spread far and wide, and men and boys came hurrying to join in the search for the missing one. Three days flew quickly by, and no tidings of the lost child had come to the anxious father and mother. The search went on till the dark forest had been carefully looked over for miles around; and then, with sad hearts the weary men went to their homes.

That father and mother still mourn in their desolate home for the lost one; while in hundreds of other homes parents are happy, and some even thank the dear Saviour until you are lost forever? Will you not make your parents happy, yourselves happy, and the angels in heaven happy, by coming to Jesus, and staying and walking close by his side all the way through life?—The Well Spring.

About Trees.

A tree is an animal with roots a vegetable being. At its roots are little sponges, that absorb the food on which the tree partly lives, very much as the glands of the stomach do our food.

The sap is the blood of this vegetable animal. It is so formed by these little sponges or glands; it circulates up the tree in the spring, and down it in the fall, reminding one of the way in which the blood circulates through the veins into the heart, and through the arteries from it out to every member and fibre of the body.

The leaves of the tree are its lungs. Through these it breathes; there are small air-cells on the lower surface of every leaf, and it is through these that the respiration takes place. In the lively-orange these cells are some 15,000 to the square inch; while, in the yucca, 40,000. Of course the microscope only can detect them. The breathing process is very much like ours; we breathe in oxygen, and breath out carbonic acid gas; the plant reverses the gases, that is all—inhaling carbonic acid, and exhaling oxygen. Plants and trees are ... poison which we throw off from the lungs, and furnish in return the oxygen which is necessary for our own lives. There is a uniform temperature about a tree, as there is about the body when in health.

The tree sleeps no less than ourselves; the period of winter being its night of rest. It rests also more or less at night. It reaches its full growth in due time, and, like an animal at the same stage of its life, begins to decay. It has certain sicknesses also, which may attack and destroy it.

Of the whole vegetable kingdom of God, I do not know anything more beautiful than a fine tree. It graces the landscape, affords shade to the panting cattle, and, besides this, is useful in various ways to the farmer.

In England a great deal of store is set on a fine tree. There are parks and forests of them that are taken as good care of as if every oak were a peach. In our own country we have begun to realize the value of trees. Laws are passed for their protection, and in some of the Western States any man may get a farm of one hundred and sixty acres by setting out another tract with forest trees, and taking good care of them, for a certain time.

Some fruit trees bloom before they leaf, and others leaf before they bloom. Of the former kind are the peach and cherry. If you look at them to-day, they are a dense mass of white and pink; in about ten days the white and pink are all gone, and the tree is a rich green. Of the latter kind is the apple. In this tree the leaf comes first, and then the beautiful pink or white blossom. The damson, unlike the peach and the cherry, blossoms, but keeps its great white flowers on till the leaves come; and so it is a prettier tree to look at than the others. How strange that the same soil and the same sunshine should make trees so unlike!

From the small dwarf up to the mighty banyan, trees are wonderful evidences of the goodness of our Heavenly Father. In some places their broad leaves catch the rain, and thus afford the only drinking water for the natives for miles around. In other places there are trees that yield milk, and the people who live near come with bowls and get this for themselves and their families. In still other countries there are trees which bear bread. And thousands of trees yield sweet and nutritious nuts which serve as food for many thousands of the human race.

The way in which a tree will balance itself on a hillside is very interesting. Plant a cherry tree, say, on a steep hill, and it will act just like a rope-walker. It will lean up hill, and grow in that direction just as if it had intelligence. God has given all these things a law.

Winter Traveling in Colorado.

The train discharges its freight into a dozen coaches, which set off for the mountain pass that lies between Norton and Leadville; they rattle off through the whirling snows toward the range of mountains, which is already thick with storms. Our own way lies across the South Park towards a lower part of the Arkansas Valley; for ten miles the four horses hurry the light open wagon over the snow-covered plain, through the blinding snow that dies before the blasts rushing down from the mountain ravines. Then we find our way upon the regular freighting road that leads in a devious course through the mountain gorges to Leadville. It is a way for which little has been done except by the wheels of the endless trains of wagons; but nature meant this land for roads; the scant foliage and slight rainfall leave each of the ravines a natural road, and the frost has snow bound and buttoned us together. Every mile of this trail is dotted by a long caravan of the freighting teams that carry in provisions and take out bullion. The ordinary train consists of many teams, each composed of two wagons, the hinder one facing without a tongue, and the two coupled together as closely as two railway cars. Sometimes there are three wagons in a string. Eight or ten mules and a single driver supply the motive power. With this "outfit" one extra driver will drag about ten thousand pounds of freight at the rate of twenty-five miles a day. The labor is extremely arduous and the life of the rudest, but the profits are very large; many of these teams earning from thirty to fifty dollars per day not for a half year at a time. The men live in I generally sleep with their animals, even in this fierce cold.

A couple of days or two will always get their aid in passing through the perplexing blockade where trains going in opposite directions meet on a narrow defile. Their life is one of trials. We are rarely out of sight of dead horses or mules which have broken their legs or died of overwork, and every precipice along the road shows the wreck of wagons that have slipped over the edge into the gorge below. In two hundred miles' travel with them I did not hear a brutal word from one man to another, and I was indebted to them for many considerate acts. They are a marvelously profane lot, but their swearing has a curiously impersonal character. At night, when they gather around the fire, in the low-walled turf-covered ranches, they are perfectly mute; the sit on the benches as still as mummies, until they slip upon the floor and snore until morning. They seem wrapped up in their own thoughts, or in the place where their thoughts ought to be. They often camp along by the roadside; indeed, many of them seem to prefer the absolute isolation that they find in blocking a the scrub-woods ten miles from neighbors. One night I sought direction from one of these solitary men. He was a huge, grizzle-bearded fellow, whom I surprised cooking his supper by a little fire in a niche in the rocks near his team. His ugly visage stood out in a blaze of his bacon, which he was toasting on a stick. He gave me sufficient answers without looking up to see who it was shouting at him out of the darkness.—By N. S. SHALER, in the Atlantic.

HORSE-BUILDING APE.—In the middle of Africa is found an ape which builds a shelter for himself in a tree. He selects a branch of a tall tree growing nearly straight out, and about 20 feet from the ground. This branch is for his floor, and over it he makes a roof, exactly in the shape of a large umbrella, with a trunk of the tree for the handle. It is made of leafy branches, tied on to the tree with vines, of which African woods are full, and is so well shaped and neatly made that it would do credit to a human builder. When the ape is at home, he sits in the branch with his head up under the green roof, and an arm around the trunk to hold on. One animal lives in each house alone, and he uses it only until he has eaten all the food he cares for near, and then he builds a new house in another place.

A Reminder.

With the opening of spring, and with favorable conditions for pastoral work and good congregations, we would remind our brethren of the claims of the ADVOCATE to their favor and help. This paper is the organ of three Conferences, the Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. It is their property, and jointly under their control. By them it was established, and by them it has been sustained. The paper represents no individual interests. Neither editor nor publisher has any proprietorship in it. It is the property of these Conferences, and to them it must look for its continued support and patronage. The preachers of these three Conferences are the agents of the paper, and specially obligated to work for it.

As the servants of these Conferences, and employed by them, the editor and publisher are doing their best to make a good paper. Have we not a right to look to all the members of the patronizing Conferences for hearty co-operation in the effort to furnish the church with a first-rate religious journal? Our dependence is upon the preachers, and upon such of our readers as may volunteer in securing subscribers. If all will do something, much altogether will be accomplished. Some are doing well, but we fear the majority are negligent in regard to this important church enterprise.

A real pastoral visit is one in which special inquiry is made in reference to the Conference paper; and, if it is not in the family, the duty of taking it will be urged. Besides the matter of family prayer, and the study of the Bible, the vigilant pastor will also inform himself about the papers his people read. "Do you take our ADVOCATE?" is not an impertinent question for him to ask in every home, and he is strictly in the line of pastoral duty when he insists that every family should have it. If we were not the editor we believe we should hazard the assertion that the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, take it all in all, is about as good as any, and the best for all Methodists within the bounds of the Conferences to which it belongs. It is for them to support it as their own, and to aid us in improving its quality and in extending its circulation. No family in our bounds can afford to be without it, and no pastor can afford to overlook this great need of his flock.

Along with the spring weather the campaign of church activity opens in earnest. Our friends, both ministers and laymen, are invited to send us items of news concerning the church, and also about all matters of interest in their localities. Temperance, education, agriculture, religion, and even politics, not of a partizan character, are topics of general interest. We desire especially to hear from every district, from every pastoral charge, and from every college and school, and often, when there is anything of special moment to report. The religious and secular news of the world at large we can gather from our exchanges, but for what is going on at home we must depend largely upon our readers and agents. Will our brethren oblige us in this matter, and this also contribute to the interest and value of their paper. News items and notes of local affairs are always eagerly sought and read. Let us have more material for our "Field Notes," and from the work. Let us know what is being done in our own bounds.

The prohibition movement is one that greatly simplifies the temperance question, and that ought to unite all the friends of good order and morality. The fact is clear to most men of sound mind that the liquor traffic has become an intolerable burden to the country. It loads the people with exorbitant taxes, it destroys the peace of communities, it is the cause of the greater part of the crimes committed. There is no need to discuss the nature of the wines of Scripture, whether alcoholic beverages are sedative, stimulating, nutritious, or are always, and in every form and quantity, harmful. Neither need there be controversy concerning the religious obligation of total abstinence, or whether light wines are good or bad. The ruin, pauperism, and burdensome taxation which are caused by the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, are beyond dispute.

Leaving the moral and religious questions involved in abeyance, the economical and social interests of every community demand prohibition. The citizens and tax payers have a right to rise up in defense of social order and the well-being of society, and insist that upon these grounds this mammoth curse of the world shall be abated. For the sake of enriching the manufacturers and dealers in this poison, they are under no obligations to submit to a business which is destructive of every temporal interest. Compared with questions of internal improvements, of tariff, of State or national finance, prohibition is more important than any of them. Planters, merchants, mechanics, and all forms of industry, would be materially benefitted by it, and it would be a blessing of incalculable value to all classes of the people. It would be a source of material prosperity, such as no other measure of legislation could be.

The conclusion is being reached by thoughtful people that the evil can be repressed, that the saloons and distilleries ought to be closed, and that the way to break the whisky power is by legislation. It is at the polls that the battle must be fought, and in the halls of legislation. The evil has become of such magnitude that it appeals to all men of reason, apart from their religious convictions, to aid in its removal. It as much concerns all good citizens to co-operate in overthrowing this enemy to life, health and industry, as it does to support quarantines against infections and contagious diseases, or to build levees to protect homes, property and life from destructive inundations. To secure prohibition as a political reform measure, the people must elect men to the Legislature, and executive and administrative offices, who are in favor of it.

We do not question the sincerity of some who are opposed to a sweeping prohibitory law. But, for the most part, the opposition arises from political expediency, and from those who are interested in the liquor trade. The majority in most of the States, if it could be organized, is probably in favor of the policy. We have little doubt of the ultimate success of the movement, provided its friends will throw out questions not essential, and unite on the one point of closing the saloons and banishing the distilleries.

After Easter.

The sermons and services of Easter are done, and the flowers with which the churches were profusely decorated are withered. It is to be hoped that the faith of the church has been strengthened by the exhibition of the great and inspiring doctrine of the resurrection, and that fragrant and joyous memories of it will linger with us throughout the year.

Next to faith in a crucified Christ is the abiding consciousness of a risen Saviour. This sense of a risen Saviour is interwoven in the whole Christian life, and it is a part of the innermost being of the spiritual soul. To know the power of his resurrection is the earnest endeavor and aspiration of the devout spirit. Risen with Christ is one aspect of the life of faith. In overcoming physical death, spiritual death was overcome. As Christ rose and ascended, so, spiritually, the believer rises with him, and seeks "those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."

We have passed through the period given especially to the consideration of Christ's resurrection. The fact has been sifted and re-examined, its historical credibility has been discussed, its relation to the entire work of redemption has been set forth, and its moral and doctrinal import has been expounded. Shall we carry with us from the sermons, from the music and the bright floral array, the deep consolation that there is in Christ the risen One, and shall the joyous vibrations of Easter melodies be drowned along the checkered and often weary path of every day life? It is likely enough that some who had doubts and misgivings have attained to a firmer footing, and that many have been cheered up by Christ's resurrection, from the sloughs of despondency to a bright and happy assurance. The practical question is: are we indeed risen with him? Have we been quickened by a divine power? have we entered on a new life, and are we chiefly intent on seeking the things which are where Christ sitteth?

It is so wonderful fact that Christ rose from the dead. Its value as a miraculous attestation of the truth of the gospel, and of Christ's claims as the Son of God, is inestimable. It demonstrates our own immortality. And yet what has it done for us if it has not brought us up out of the death of sin, and breathed into us the vital thrill of faith and love. Life and immortality, truly, have been brought to light, but not for us, until the power of Christ's resurrection is felt in our hearts. If we be risen with Christ, the Easter of our experience is to be followed by the constant seeking of heavenly things. How little was Christ of this world preceded his ascension? What ought to be our spiritual resurrection life? how little of the world, and how much of heaven should he in it? The risen Lord has raised us that our affections may follow him within the veil. Having burst the bonds of death, he could but ascend, and, having set us free from the death of sin, we cannot but seek the things above. Christ is risen, and we are risen with him. What then must be our chief employ, the absorbing pursuit? Has he so robbed death of its terrors, stripped the grave of its triumph, and opened to us the gates of light, that we can now think God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ?

Surely the resurrection of our Lord is something more than a wonder, something more than a curious theme for speculation or an ingenious conjecture. It is a living power in believing hearts, and the symbol of that life which moves ever toward the heavenly place. Shall the Easter festival, and the stupendous fact which it commemorates, make this abiding and practical impression upon us? After Easter shall there follow the unworldly life, the heavenly conversation, and fellowship with him who has ascended on high, and who has entered into the presence of God for us? "Hid with Christ in God" is the true believer's life. Risen with him, he seeks the things which are above.

With a Reader.

The following communication, not written specially for publication, is of such general interest to all sincere inquirers that we take the liberty of inserting it here with comments:

To reading the ADVOCATE to-night I came upon your article on "Sound Conversions." The subjects of faith and conversion need a great deal more light than they are likely ever to get on this side, and I think you will allow me to steal a few moments of your valuable time.

If "a seeker concludes that having surrendered himself to Christ, having believed according to the promise, and having made confession of sin, he is accepted and forgiven" is it in accordance with the Scriptures that he may not have "the witness of the Holy Spirit?" A sinner's part is to repent and believe. Are we not told that if we do these our sins are forgiven? "I believed I was converted, but I was mistaken," has always sounded paradoxical to me; it seems to me to contain within itself a manifest contradiction. How can I be "mistaken" if I "believe," unless the Word of God is mistaken?

Lastly, if one "loves the brethren," loves the prayer meeting and class meeting, has a tender conscience, and a heart whose habitual promptings for good show in his daily walk and conversation, would you hesitate to place him among the subjects of "sound conversions?"

1. The condition of pardon is faith; its exercise is attended with repentance, confession, and a surrender of all to Christ. If any one believes aright he is justified by that faith. "For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness." But saving faith is the condition; it is the means to an end. How can a penitent know that he has a true faith until there is in him a conscious sense of the blessing sought? Pardon is the act of God, and involves a change of relations to him. The pardoned sinner passes from a state of condemnation to that of acceptance, and he enters into spiritual sonship. It seems to us that assurance is needed, and we gather from Scripture that it is given. "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." If our faith is followed by this peace and rejoicing, we may conclude that we have believed with the heart unto righteousness. It is written: "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." Connect this passage with another: "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." It is declared explicitly: "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." It would seem to be in accordance with Scripture that those who have truly believed are the sons of God, and that they have the witness of the Holy Spirit. As we interpret the Scriptures, every child of God has this witness in some degree. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." There are, it may be, various degrees of assurance; in some cases it may be temporarily obscured, and some, having it in the sense of a comfortable persuasion and conviction, may not apprehend it as the witness of the Spirit. But we do not see how, in the light of Scripture, we can be the pardoned and adopted children of God, and not have this inward, direct witness of the Holy Spirit.

2. Concerning mistakes in conversion, the only question is whether there is liability to self deception. Of this we have no doubt whatever. Especially in the face of the warnings of Scripture, we think there is danger from this cause. Many of these are directed against backsliding and apostacy, but we do not see why the self-deception or mistake may not occur at the time of confessing Christ as well as afterwards. It is certain that people may think themselves to be Christians when they are not. Hence the exhortation: "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves; know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" The foolish virgins in the parable thought they were prepared, and were waiting for the coming of the Bridegroom. A man may be mistaken in regard to his faith. Surely if he have not peace with God, and the spirit of adoption, he has reason to distrust it. If it does not bring relief from the burden of sin, purify the heart, and make him a new creature in Christ, it can not be the faith that justifies. There need be no self-deception. It is the seeker's duty and privilege to pray and strive until the witness of the Spirit is given, and he feels and knows that he has passed from death unto life.

3. Our correspondent's "lastly" describes, in many respects, the character of a converted person. In any case such an one can not be far from the kingdom of God. We should say that he is "soundly converted." Perhaps he is one of many of the best Christians we have ever known, who knows not the time nor the place of his conversion, and who has gradually reached the consciousness of sins forgiven. If he loves the brethren, the prayer meeting, the class meeting, has a tender conscience, and a heart prompting to good, and a life that is good, we should say that he must have faith, and the communion of the Holy Ghost. And yet, in such cases as this, there may be the privilege of a stronger and clearer witness of the Spirit, and a call to a deeper spiritual experience. Holiness of heart and life is the grand result. If the Christian professor is not a new creature in Christ, if he has no felt deliverance from sin, and no sense of the mighty change which conversion and holiness imply, "there is a mistake somewhere." He has not been soundly converted. A holy character is the supreme end. A right faith is unto righteousness. There is no occasion to inquire about the faith of a man who is a Christian. Neither God nor men will doubt here. The true logic of the matter is not to argue from faith to conversion, but from conversion to faith.

Notes from Nashville.

This is Good Friday; so called because on this day the benefits derived from the Saviour's death are solemnly and gratefully remembered. Our Saxon forefathers called it Long Friday, because of the length of the fast and other observances on this day. It is connected with Easter, of course, hence, while the latter was called "the Pasch of the Resurrection," this was called "the Pasch of the Crucifixion."

Good Friday is one of the three holydays which John Wesley placed in the calendar of the Methodist Episcopal Church, viz.: Christmas, Good Friday and Ascension Day. The first, of course, sometimes comes on a Sunday, and others on Friday and Thursday. Ascension Day was never much observed by American Methodists. Good Friday used to be kept by them, but it is going into desuetude, and Christmas is becoming changed from a holyday to a holiday. It is worthy of note that while only one collect is appointed for any other day, there are three collects appointed for Good Friday. The third collect is one of great interest, as it sets forth the universality of the atonement, in opposition to the Unitarians; how a Calvinist can repeat it is just one's comprehension: "O, merciful God, who hast made all men, and hatest nothing that thou hast made, nor wouldest the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live; have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, infidels and heretics, and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of thy word, and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, to thy flock, that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one fold under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ, our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen." What an excellent prayer to be used at a missionary meeting! And what better day than Good Friday for a missionary meeting! We expect to hold an appropriate service at West End Church, after all the duties of the university are over. Services have been held there during the week, our theological students taking part in them, with good results. I may, D. V., preach an Easter sermon there on Sunday. The Rev. R. K. Brown, pastor of Elm Street Church, will preach one at Vanderbilt Chapel.

Dr. Granbery is to preach on Easter Sunday at Lebanon, where there is a great revival, as there is one at Pulaski. Dr. Dodd is to preach at Tulip Street Church, where there is a meeting in progress. Dr. Wilson is engaged for Elm Street. We have no unpreaching prelates among us. Bishop McTyeire expects to officiate on Easter day in Louisville.

We held our regular monthly meeting of the Board of Missions on Wednesday. The two Lambuths, father and son, were present. They will remain in this country for some time, the former for the re-establishment of his health, which is much improved, and the latter to attend hospitals, etc., to prepare him more fully for his medical work in China. Meanwhile, the Rev. Dr. Allen has been appointed superintendent of the China mission, which is reported prosperous, notwithstanding the affliction which has come upon it. We are in expectation of a very interesting time at our May meeting, when we hope Bishop Wightman will be able to be with us, and that all the members of the board will be in attendance.

We understand that Bishop Wightman, Judge Jackson and some others, appointed as delegates to the Ecumenical Conference, will not be able to attend. At the May meeting of the Bishops substitutes will be appointed. The topics to be discussed, and the order of discussion, and the delegates who are to prepare essays and make speeches, are now being adjusted by the Eastern and Western sections. But the Business Committee will have charge of all these things. The New York Independent thinks that the scare of the British brethren at the mention of a doctrinal consensus resulted from the fact that there are doctrinal diversities among Methodists. The Western section never dreamed of controversy on doctrine at the Conference; all it wants is to ascertain what are the specific standards of the several connections, and we hope the Business Committee will procure the data in the premises. The Independent speaks of a British gag on American Methodists; but few will think that it was intended, and none will imagine that Americans would submit to be gagged. John Bull learned that lesson in '76. We hope for great harmony in the Conference, and good results from it, for which let prayer be offered by all to "the Author of peace, and lover of concord."

Vanderbilt is drawing near the end of the session. Examinations begin May 9, and end May 23. The commencement sermon is to be preached by Dr. Messick, on Sunday morning, May 22, and in the afternoon Dr. L. D. Oliver is to deliver a discourse before the Biblical Department. Gov. Colquitt is to address the Literary Societies. Commencement day takes place this year on Founder's day, May 27.

We shall have a number of good young preachers, who could do work on any circuit or station which may need supplies. I should be glad for Bishops, presiding elders or others to communicate with me on this point as soon as possible. Some have already done so, and men are being selected. Our boys are workers. Give them fields, and they will do good service. We matriculated seventy this session. New Wesley Hall will be open to receive twice or thrice as many, September 1. Let all who are interested send for the new catalogue or "Register," and be sure to comply with the conditions there specified.

THOS. O. SUMMERS.

From Great Britain.

"Truce of St. Patrick." What does it mean? Three days of total abstinence—St. Patrick's day and the day before and the day after the annual holiday. Archbishop Manning enjoins this truce upon the Romanists of his archdiocese. The cardinal pays considerable attention to the welfare of the working classes. Indeed, he evinces more than ordinary interest in all questions of social and moral reform.

The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin has issued three pastorals, and they all refer to the Land League agitation, more or less. Dr. McCabe appears to be in a close place. He lives near to the Viceroy's castle, and Earl Spencer will, of course, use his influence with the Archbishop in the interests of peace and order. Moreover, Dr. McCabe is moderate in his views, and not so Ultramontane as Dr. Croke, Archbishop of Cashel. However, his sympathies are with the league; must of necessity be. Romanism in Ireland, since England ruled the country, has been impatient, restive and unloyal under Saxon control. Rome is plant in its method of procedure, the most accommodating of religious systems, and yet, in spirit and aspiration, unchanged and unchangeable. Dr. McCabe's pastoral disapproval of the league is meant for the government more than for the faithful in Ireland. These know, through their parish priests, the real policy of the Vatican, and act accordingly.

And poor old Leo feels how utterly impotent he is to lord it over my country, even the most superstitious and down-trodden, beneath the unscrupulous, all merciless heel of ecclesiastical despotism. Spain has been in this dark and abject plight for ages, and yet that country is relieving itself of the incubus which has kept it so long in the dust. A native Protestant pastor was imprisoned lately by the local authorities for holding prayer meetings. The council of ministers at Madrid have given him a free pardon, and, in reply to the Papal Nuncio, states that neither the concordat nor the constitution is violated, by the toleration the government is determined to grant the Spaniards who are not Catholic, and that no interference of the Bishops and the Holy See against the right of the government, under the constitution, will be tolerated. That is a plain word; let the Pope mind his own business, and attend to ecclesiastical concerns, for we will not permit him to interfere with us. What a snub, especially coming from Spain. Some other Leo's, who occupied Peter's chair, would scarcely have submitted to such a rebuke. But times have changed.

The annual report of the Wesleyan Chapel Committee has just been published, and it indicates prosperity. Two hundred and ninety-five churches were erected during the year. Of this number one hundred and twenty-five are new, fifty-eight have been erected in localities where Methodism had no existence before, and sixty-seven supercede former erections. Accommodation has been provided for 25,689 additional persons. During the year thirteen houses, twenty school rooms, forty-two organs and ninety-five chapel alterations and enlargements have been completed. The entire outlay was £312,518. Much as this is, it is more than £72,000 less than the expenditure of the previous year.

The Coercion Bill is in force, and Land League agitators are being arrested. There are more than thirty of them in prison. This is vigorous work, but it is supposed to have been required by the exceptional circumstances of the country. Possibly so. But unless the government introduces a land bill, ample and liberal in its provisions, so generous as to sweep away the gigantic land grievance, the Coercion Bill will do more harm than good to the peace and prosperity of the country.

The Negro in the North.

Under the caption of "Learning from Experience," the editor of the Texas Christian Advocate quotes and comments as follows:

The United Presbyterian, published at Pittsburg, says:

A teacher of freedmen in the South, after having seen the habits of a set of blacks in a Northern town, said she would not like to see her pupils come in contact with them. She knew it would be to their disadvantage. Certain it is, that wherever the colored people are gathered into towns, not settlements in the North, they are in a state of great degradation. Nor are they improving. Good people, interested in them as they belong to an unfortunate race, and so numerous they are so needy, are you wholly unable to help them, since they do not know what to do. There is a wisdom needed on the subject which has not yet been attained to.

The Northern people are waking up to the fact that the problem respecting the colored race, which they intended to work out for the amelioration of all mankind is somewhat difficult of solution. They have in some of their towns and cities a few hundred colored people and they do not know what to do with them. They make up for their failures and directions toward this race at their own doors very comfortably by lecturing the Southern people respecting their duty to these men and brethren who swarm the South by the million. No trite of African blood in the past century has advanced further and faster from barbarism toward civilization than the negroes on Southern plantations. They were brought in contact with a superior race and as they learn chiefly by imitation, they improved rapidly by the contact. They were brought under religious instruction and the missionary gave proof of the fidelity of Southern Christianity to the trust providentially placed at their door. At the commencement of the late war there were not only more negroes in the South who were actual communicants in the different branches of the Christian church than were found in all the missions on the continent of Africa, but they outnumbered all the converts to Christianity won by the labors of all the Protestant missionaries of Europe and America at that date throughout the entire world. Northern churches have come in and gathered this fruit of the self-sacrificing labors of the Southern preachers on the plantations of the South; and then, as they parade their numbers before the world, they proudly say:

The following ladies were elected as Board of Managers for one year:

Mesdames Theo. Pritchard, M. R. Cooney, H. T. Bartlette, K. Fuhri, T. G. Richardson, T. V. Copland, D. V. Given, Jr., R. M. Walmsley, Perry Nugent, S. Delgado, J. B. Wallace, Albert Baldwin, T. H. Subjoined is the list of officers elected from the Board of Managers: President, Mrs. H. T. Bartlette; Vice Presidents, Mrs. R. M. Walmsley, Mrs. T. G. Richardson, Mrs. J. R. Juden, Mrs. Simpson, Mrs. Albert Baldwin; Recording Secretary, Mrs. Theodore Anze; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Wharton; Treasurer, Mrs. Chas. Kells.

A vote of thanks was tendered Mrs. Walmsley for so ably discharging the duties of chairman, after which the meeting adjourned, subject to call of Board of Managers.

Miss Francis E. Willard, of Chicago, President of the Christian Women's National Temperance Union, delivered addresses at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association in this city on Saturday and Sunday last. She left New Orleans on Monday, April 18, expecting to return in the fall. The Picayune, in its notice of her Sunday afternoon lecture, says:

After three or four hymns were sung, Rev. D. E. Mitchell, Secretary of the Association, introduced Miss Willard, who spoke about an hour upon the subject and work of her mission and that of the Union she represents.

The women of the church and Sunday school were doing everything in their power in the North, East and West, and along the Atlantic seaboard, to put down the power of rum. More especially had the work been pushed forward in Ohio to success.

Thirty-four States organizations had been effected, embracing the wards of twenty thousand Christian women. It was war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt, against the rumseller. The crusade was over, the purpose now being organization and Christian women's work.

The purpose of Mrs. Willard in coming South was to visit forty of the leading cities in fourteen States, and effect organizations of the Union therein. As New Orleans was the metropolis of the South, it is intended, upon the invitation of the friends of the cause, to send here some of the very best workers in the Union.

—From a dispatch in our news column it will be seen that Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield, died at his residence in London, Tuesday morning, April 19. He was a Jew by birth, but a professed Christian. He was born in London, December 21, 1805. A brilliant novelist and man of letters, he had attained to high distinction and power as a parliamentary leader and statesman. Twice he became premier of England, the last time retiring from office in 1880. His last great services to his government were rendered in the Berlin Congress, which brought about the settlement of the Eastern Turkish question. He was raised to the peerage, and made Earl of Beaconsfield, as a recognition of these eminent services.

He was a man of remarkable and varied gifts, and has made a deep impress upon his times. His real merits as a statesman and author will be variously estimated, but there will be none to question the versatility of his genius, and the powers of a mind that were subtle, sagacious and brilliant. Like Palmerston and others of England's most noted statesmen, Beaconsfield's greatest achievements crowned his old age, and belong to that period of life when most men have retired from the stage of activity. We doubt whether his literary works have contributed anything to the betterment of the world. As a statesman, his measures may have advanced the political power and prestige of his country. In private life we believe his character was without stain, and commanded the respect of both political friends and opponents.

—The St. Charles Avenue Sunday-school, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of this city, held an Easter service on last Sunday afternoon. The superintendent, S. K. Russ, had charge, and the occasion was a very pleasant one. The body of the church was well filled with people. The services consisted of responsive Scripture reading, recitations by the children, singing, and a very appropriate address by the pastor, Dr. Mathews, on the origin, meaning, history, and various manners of observing the Easter festival. Each class sent to the platform an Easter offering of money and of flowers. The floral decorations of the pulpit and chancel were very profuse and very beautiful. At the morning service of this church Dr. Mathews received fourteen [illegible] church on profession of faith.

—So far as we have heard all of our city pastors last Sunday preached on the resurrection, Bishop Keener occupying the pulpit at Carondelet Street in the morning. Nearly all our churches were more or less adorned with flowers. Perhaps the only exception was the Louisiana Avenue Church, in which there was not so much as a bud or sprig. We find there a spiritual sermon, by the pastor, on the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of dead souls. The entire service was religion pure and undefiled. We liked the simplicity of it, and did not regret the absence of the elaborate bouquets and wreathes. Of this growing tendency to esthetic display, and observance of church festivals, we stand somewhat in doubt. Perhaps there is a middle course, but when the door is once open we fear that the encroachments of formality, style and superstition will overlay that which is spiritual.

On Tuesday, April 12, there was quite a brilliant and impressive marriage service at the St. Charles Avenue Church, the pastor, Rev. Dr. Mathews, officiating. The happy couple, made one in the bonds of holy matrimony, were Dr. David Barrow, son of the late David Barrow, of East Feliciana parish, and Miss Mary Blunt Parham, daughter of Mr. John G. Parham, of New Orleans. The church was handsomely decorated for the occasion, and there was a large assembly present to greet and congratulate the wedded pair. We trust that the pathway of our young friends through life may be strewn with flowers, and that the holy rite, consummated amidst so much of fragrance, beauty and joy, may be blessed by the benedictions of heaven.

DEATH OF REV. D. M. HUDSON.

A postal from Rev. J. Bancroft, dated Tuskegee, Ala., April 13, says: "Our Brother, D. M. Hudson, died in great peace last night." Bro. Hudson was a superannuated member of the Alabama Conference. He was by no means an aged man, but had been in infirm health for some time. Two or three years ago we heard him preach several times at the Seashore camp-meeting, and we were greatly impressed with his short, terse, convincing and pointed sermons. He was a man of extensive reading, and deeply spiritual. He stood among his brethren as one of the purest and most devoted. Those who knew him most intimately appreciated him most and loved him best. We trust that Bro. Bancroft, or some other member of his Conference, will furnish us with a suitable memoir.

—Rev. B. R. Duval, of Virginia, is spending a few weeks in New Orleans. Bro. Duval was for many years a member of the Virginia Conference, but is now a local preacher, and laboring as an evangelist wherever his services are desired. He has laid on our table a little volume containing a narrative of his life and travels in Mexico and British Honduras. It is an entertaining and rather unique account of personal observations, and adventures by flood and field.

—We have but just heard of the death of Mrs. Mary R. Lewis, widow of Thomas H. Lewis, and mother of Rev. Fisher T. Rawson. She died in Jackson parish, La., January 1, 1881. An obituary, furnished by her son, will appear in the ADVOCATE next week. The older Methodists of New Orleans will remember Sister Rawson, afterward Sister Lewis, as she was identified with our church here at a very early day.

REVIVAL AT ENTERPRISE, MISS.

Rev. J. T. Heard, writing from Enterprise, Miss., April 13, says: "Last night closed a good meeting in this place, which began March 27. Thirteen persons professed to find Jesus. We were greatly assisted by Rev. B. R. Duval, of Virginia."

—The Woman's Missionary Society of the Alabama Conference held its regular session at Union Springs, Ala., April 8-9. The annual address of the president, Mrs. E. C. Dowdell, has been received, and will appear in the ADVOCATE next week.

—Rev. J. Perry Drake, of the Mississippi Conference, was ordained elder by Bishop Keener, Saturday, April 16. The ordination service took place in the pastor's office of the Carondelet Street Church, of this city, a number of our city pastors being present and joining in the imposition of hands.

—The Revival Meetings, says the Pacific Methodist of April 1, are continued at Howard Presbyterian Church on Mission street in the evening, and at the Association Hall on Sutter street at noon. Mr. Hallenbeck is at San Jose, and Mr. and Mrs. Stebbins remain in the city singing at the two meetings mentioned. Mr. Moody is stirring the Christian capitalists on the subject of paying the debt of the Young Men's Christian Association, and saying the beautiful building. It is said that he has nearly two-thirds of the amount already subscribed.

Rev. John A. Ellis, presiding elder of the Vicksburg district, Mississippi Conference, informs us that the Vicksburg District Conference will meet at Fayette, June 3-5, instead of May 27-28, as previously published.

Bro. Ellis, writing April 14, says: The work in the district is generally healthful, but not going forward in manifest results. Contractors are beginning their work for the addition to East Mississippi Female College.

The Sugar Bowl, referring to the Sunday ordinance question in New Iberia, La., says:

Rev. Mr. Clay addressed a large audience of colored ministers and influential colored people, last Monday night, on the question of closing business places on Sunday, and we are glad to learn that all the colored church members are strongly in favor of such a law.

The Tennessee Legislature has revoked the charters of a great many small towns in that State, in order that the "four mile temperance law," which provides that no intoxicating liquor shall be sold within four miles of a chartered educational institution, may go into effect.

Rev. Jesse Boring, D. D., presiding elder of the Atlanta District, North Georgia Conference, was married at Atlanta on the 14th ult., to Mrs. Harriet Colquitt, step-mother of the Governor, Bishop Pierce officiating.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has just closed a series of meetings at Meriden, Ct., where over 1,100 persons professed conversion. His biographer compares him to Summerfield, whose methods he so closely follows.

The Australasian Conference has acted upon the matter of the Ecumenical, and decided to send delegates. This completes the circuit of Methodism and justifies the term Ecumenical in an actual sense.

The Revs. J. J. Ransom, J. L. Kennedy, J. W. Roger and wife, and Miss. Mattie B. Watts, left New York for Brazil, on the Germanic, on Saturday, March 26.

Hon. Oliver Hoyt has given Dr. Clark St. [illegible] for the Wesley Monumental Church at Savannah, Ga. He had previously given $2,000 for the same purpose.

Books and Periodicals.

A Brother's Inquest, over a Brother's Grave, by Rev. T. A. Goodwin, is a powerful temperance tract. A drunken brother murders a brother who had befriended him in every possible way. The murdered brother was a Christian, and an upright and valuable citizen. It was the author's brother who was murdered, and his brother, who, under the influence of liquor, did the killing, and who is now in the penitentiary for life. The real murderers are the whisky-dealers and the law makers, who permit and authorize the accursed business. Rev. T. A. Goodwin's address is Indianapolis, Ind.

"How we fed the Baby to make her Healthy and Happy, with Health Hints" is the title of a paper, covered 12mo of 138 pages, by C. E. Paige, M. D. Fowler and Wells, publishers, New York. Price 50 cents. It is about feeding and Caring for infants, and it appears to be a sensible work.

Jeter, Plumer and Doggett, with portraits. Also a Memorial Discourse by Rev. Dr. M. D. Hoge. The pamphlet contains a sermon from each of the distinguished dead, and their portraits. The memorial discourse of Dr. Hoge, is excellent, of course. Those discourses were originally published in the January number of the Southern Pulpit.

To the Legislature of Ohio, some years ago, there was a warm dispute whether or certain proposed railroad should commence at a given point down or at a certain other point up the river. "Who ever heard," said a down-the-river advocate, "of beginning anything at the top? Who ever heard of building a chimney from the top down-ward? Who ever saw a house begunt the top?" Up jumped a Dutch member from up the river county. "Meester Brezident, de gentleman say dat deze beezness ees all von humbug, because ve vants to begin our railroad all de top ov de State, and he makes some seedy comparisons about de house and de chimney. I vould also ask de gentleman von question." Members kept up de State, ven dey begins to build von well, do dey begins mit de bottom ov de well, or do dey begins mit de top ov de well? Vell de gentlemans has answer me dat leetle vun question." The laughter which explosively followed this Teutonic retort, showed who, in the opinion of the legislators, had the better of the argument.

A certain literary gentleman, wishing to be undisturbed one day, instructed his Irish servant to admit no one, and, if any one should inquire for him, to give him an "equivocal answer." Night came, and the gentleman proceeded to interrogate Pat as to his callers. "Did any one call?" "Yis, sur, wan gintleman." "What did he say?" "He said he was not home." "Well, what did you tell him?" "Sure, I gave him a quick answer, sir." "How was that?" "I told him he was his grandmother, a monkey."

A poor history is a very inconvenient thing. So a man found it who lately called on a friend, and in course of the conversation asked him how his good father was. "He is dead, I dog you, do know it," answered the friend. "Indeed! I am distressed to hear it," said the visitor. "I had no idea of it," and he proceeded to express his sympathy. A year after he called again and forgetfully asked: "How is your good father?" The sticker reply was, "still dead."

Said a venerable and eccentric preacher in a recent speech to a promiscuous audience: "Brethren, I can almost shake hands with Moses." The audience were touched to tears, so graphic seemed this expression of his nearness to eternity. But from a part of his hearers there came loud snorts, for his arms, stretched toward the sky in an agitative gesture, were known to be the longest in the conference.

Slightly sarcastic was the clergyman who paused and addressed a man coming into church after a sermon had begun, with the remark: "Glad to see you, sir. Come in." Always glad to see those here late who can't come early." And decidedly self-possessed was the man thus addressed in the presence of an astonished congregation, as he responded: "Thank you. Would you favor me with the text?"

"And what have you to be thankful for?" said Mrs. X. to Mrs. Y., as they came out of church together, at the close of a long and frosty sermon upon thankfulness by "one of our exchanges." "I'm thankful that he is'n't our minister," said Mrs. Y., and she hastened home to cold viands which the length of sermon had served up.

One night Uncle Harvey, keeper of a poor-house down in Maine, was aroused by the groans of one of the old men. "What is the matter?" he asked. "I'm dying, Uncle Harvey," said the old man. "I'm dying, so send for the clergyman. I must have something to pass away the time."

Arabella sat on her toes in a chair, clutching convulsively at her skirts. "Oh, Bridget! A mouse! a mouse! Come and catch it quick!" Bridget: "Shure, mum, there's no hurry. If the cat gets away, I can catch plenty more for you, mum."

"No, William," she mournfully interjected, still allowing him to retain her hand, "No, William, I can't marry you. I don't believe you can provide a wife with butter upon your present salary, and I can't eat oleomargarine."

STRAWBERRY CULTURE.—Seeing an inquiry about strawberries we propose to offer a few suggestions to those about commencing their culture. Only a small number of people in the country cultivate strawberries at all, and a large part of these do it to a great disadvantage for the want of a little knowledge. One of the most important things is to get the right kind of plants. Old plants are good for nothing, and we would not set even young plants from an old bed. We always use young plants raised from plants that have never fruited. The reason is this: The maturing of the fruit or the seed of any tree or plant is a very exhausting process. A plant produces its fruit and at the same time a number of young plants. Those young plants would have been still better, had they received all the strength of the old plant. We do not think the Wilson strawberry produces so large crops as it did twenty years ago. It is a strong plant and produces much fruit and many plants at the same time. If cultivators had only propagated from young plants that had never fruited it is probable the variety would have improved instead of going backward. Our method is to plant in the spring and cut off any blossoms that may appear the first summer. The young plants in the fall will mostly cover the ground. Either the same fall or the next spring we take a part of these plants to make a new bed, leaving the rest to bear fruit. Thus we always use plants grown from plants that have never fruited. Most plantations contain many plants that bear little or nothing. Some of these seem to be wild plants that have got mixed in; others appear to be seedlings. It is cheaper to make a new bed than to put an old one in good shape; hence we make a new bed every year. There is no dilbenty about the plants only in commencing, and then it is all important. Many get plants from a neighbor's old bed, because they cost nothing, but find in the end that they are worthless. The labor of raising all a family can use is a mere trifle, and we find it cheaper to have them than to go without. We hope the time is not far distant when every farmer will plant his strawberries annually with as much care as he does his corn or potatoes.—A. M. Williams, Syracuse, N. Y.

INSECT FRIENDS AND FOES.—At the meeting of the Western New York Agricultural Society, held at Rochester, Professor W. Saunders, of Ontario, said that it was a common error that all insects are pests to the cultivator. There are many parasites or useful ones which prey on our insect-enemies. Out of seven thousand described insects in this country, only about fifty have proved destructive to our crops. Parasites are much more numerous. Among lepidopterous insects butterflies, etc., there are very few noxious species; many active friends are found among the Hymenoptera (wasps, etc.), the ichneumon flies pre-eminently so; and in the order Hemiptera (bugs proper) are several that destroy our enemies. Hence the very common error, that birds which destroy insects are beneficial to us, as they are more likely to destroy our insect friends than the fewer enemies. Those known as flycatchers may do neither harm nor good; so far as they eat the whitemidge and Hessian fly they confer a positive benefit; in other instances they destroy both friends and enemies. Birds that are only partly insectivorous, and which eat grain and fruit, may need further inquiry. The speaker had examined the stomachs of many such birds, and particularly the American robin, and the only cherry he ever found in any of these, was a single one in a whole cherry which the bird had pulled entirely. Robins had proved very destructive to his grapes, but had not assisted at all in protecting his cabbages, growing alongside his fruit garden. These vegetables were nearly destroyed by the larvæ of the cabbage fly, which would have afforded the birds many fine, rich meals. This comparatively feeble insect has been allowed by the throngs of birds to spread over the whole continent. A naturalist, in one of the Western States, had examined several species of the thrush, and found they had eaten mostly that class of insects known as our friends.—New York Observer.

SOILING STOCK.—A writer in a recent number of the Milchy Zeitung, on the dangers to German agriculture from foreign competition, says that his own experience of fifty years, has taught him that regular soiling of cattle is best for the farmer and for his fields, bringing in greater profit and maintaining the fertility of the land at a higher point—that twice as much fodder can be produced on a given surface when a forage plant is allowed to grow as a cultivated crop and reach a certain degree of maturity, as when, as in pastures, it is continually cropped off and trodden down. He believes, as do all the best German writers on the subject, that the most successful system of agriculture in the long run, is that in which a large quantity of stock is kept and fed well, and a careful rotation of crops is followed, in which the same crop is never put twice in succession on the same land.

The soiling system makes it easier to carry out the second part of this programme, and the great variety of crops that can be raised on a long rotation provides a greater variety of fodder for the stock, so that those two features of the best modern agricultural practice work admirably together. The soiling system provides a more uniform ration in respect to quality, and avoids much loss of manure. It may be pretty safely affirmed that the droppings of cattle in the pasture are more than half wasted by drying in the sun, or by too strong dosing with manure in isolated spots here and there. Where land is cheap and abundant, and can not be profitably cultivated and carried up to a high degree of fertility, pasturage over a large portion of the farm may be allowed; but when high farming pays, pasture land is a poor investment, and may eat up a large part of the profit from the cultivated fields.

COWS AND THE WEATHER.—Cows are very sensitive to the influence of the weather. In bright, clear days their vital forces are more active and vigorous, digestion is more rapid, and assimilation and waste are more active, and secretions which, like butter, depend upon the destruction of tissue, are more abundant. Dampness is favorable to transpiration, because it relaxes the delicate membranes and makes the passage of liquids easier, and consequently more abundant. Thus, while the fats in milk diminish, the aqueous ingredients increase in muggy weather; and a given weight of milk makes less cheese than in fair weather. This loss in cheese is owing to the fact that as the albumen of the blood passes over into the milk vessels, the major part of it is converted into caseine, which is coagulable by rennet, while albumen to caseine is effected by the vital forces, and is more or less complete as they vary in strength. The greater energy of bright days increases the per cent. of caseine, and makes that of albumen less. In muggy weather this is reversed. These changes often amount to enough to make five per cent. difference in the yield of cheese in favor of good weather, while the total of albuminoids, as shown by analysis, is the greater in the muggy days. From the decrease in fat and the increase of albuminoids, which are heavier than fat, the milk of the muggy days shows the greater specific gravity, and yields a less per cent. of butter.—Prof. L. B. Arnold.

WHAT IS FARMING?—It is something more than staying on a farm. It is something more than skinning the soil. It is something more than selling hay and potatoes, and bulky crops unanimalized. Farming is a business, a profession, a practical and scientific operation whereby the soil is used for profit and improved under the operation. The processes of nature must be understood and worked in harmony with the chemistry of the earth and air. The processes of the elements must be understood, if not in their technical terms and language, in that sensible understanding, that common-sense way, that their advantage and capabilities may be turned to best accounts. The lawyer works by law and precedent; the physician works by symptoms and indications, the merchant by rules and observations, the mechanic by measures and capacities. The farmer must work by all by rules, laws, observation and experiment. He must be a practical lawyer, doctor, merchant and mechanic of the vegetable, the animal, the trade world about him. He must be a skilled workman in the productive, operative and the commercial circles in which his business lies and his sphere of speculation extends.

HONEY FROM COTTON BLOOM.—Writing in the Southern Enterprise, S. M. H. B. says: The honey from the cotton bloom is clear, almost white, quite as pretty as that from white clover, and better than the clover honey to the taste of most persons who have given opinions on the subject. While I have not tested closely enough to give a settled opinion, I believe the early have not yielded as much honey as the later cotton blooms. For several years my bees have gathered more honey from cotton blooms than from any other single source. They have at the same time brought in a bountiful supply of pollen, that helps our brood rearing and increases the winter stores. I have had colonies to gather four to five pounds surplus honey each day for a week or more, and have had colonies to gather from one to two pounds surplus honey each day for a week or more. These colonies lose enough to carry them through the winter. In my opinion honey from orange blossoms heads the list for both quality and appearance, cotton blooms next and white clover third. Why cannot every cotton planter keep bees enough to make him a good supply of honey for his own table and some to spare for the town-folks? Without the bees it is wasted or goes to nourish the caterpillar, moth; with the bees their larders are well supplied with a delicious sweet.

CARROTS AS FOOD FOR STOCK.—In many respects carrots are preferible to any kind of roots raised in this country for stock. A given weight contains a larger proportion of flesh, fat and milk-forming principles. They impart a desirable color and no undesirable odor or flavor to milk. They are rich in sugar, and are therefore, relished by young stock. When cooked they are readily eaten by pigs and poultry. As food for horses they are very far superior to any roots grown. Many horsemen in this and other cities are at great pains to procure a supply of carrots for their stables. They improve the digestion of horses, keep up their condition, and impart a gloss to the hair. Carrots are almost the only kind of roots that can be fed to horses with advantage.

SHEEP.—A few sheep could be kept upon every dairy farm with profit, and would be a benefit to the pastures, eating that which the cows rejected, and when in winter quarters, they would eat much the cows refused, and so would be of very small extra cost. The raising of sheep is of the greatest benefit to land, because wherever they feed, new and sweet grasses grow and flourish, and the weeds are destroyed. Farmers should raise turnips and feed them to sheep. A neglected, poorly-fed, stinted lamb never recovers, however, well fed afterwards, so as to make as good and as large a sheep as it would have had, had it proper care early. Feed the ewes so that they can supply the lambs with plenty of milk (and the same rules apply to cattle.

HOW TO MANAGE HORSES.—If horses paw in the stable, take a light chain and fasten it above the knee. Let it hang loose, just so it will not touch the floor. If horses kick in the stable, fasten the chain on the hind leg some way. They will keep quiet while the chain is on, and there is no danger of hurting them. To cure a halter-breaker, take a half-inch rope, a little over twice the length of the horse, make a loop in the middle of the rope (so it cannot slip, pass the horse's tail through it, then pass the ends of the rope through the rings of the halter, and hitch the ends. When he tries to pull, the rope will slip through the rings and all the strain comes on his tail. I have seen several horses broken in this way.

ANGLE WORMS.—If the soil is full of angle worms, it is also, doubtless, limpy and hard to pulverize, when broken up with the spade or plow. In this case draining is the principal remedy. An application of salt, also ashes or sand, for the banical effect, will prove beneficial.

HOG CHOLERA.—A writer says there is not much doubt but that the long continued corn diet has brought upon us the plague of cholera. He thinks the quicker the hog raisers prepare to turn their hogs into clover, artichokes and the like, the better it will be for them.

FOWLS.—Fowls seldom tire of milk. They may eat too much grain or meat for health, but milk in any form is both palatable and healthy. The first one or two litters of eggs laid by pullets are not so good for hatching purposes as those laid later.

WOOD ASHES.—Professor Roberts tells us that fifty bushels of wood ashes per acre increased the yield of grass more than any other manure, while ground bone improved the clover.

In agricultural pursuits there are at least three primary considerations applicable to all cases in connection with successful cultivation, namely, draining, manuring, and tillage.

SAWDUST.—Sawdust is too dry to be valuable in manure or composts. Burn the sawdust to convert it to ashes and use those, which contain all there is of value in the sawdust.

Household.

ROASTED SPARE-RIB.—There is no way that a pork spare-rib can be cooked as good as the old style of hanging it on a spit, and cooking it before the fire on the hearth. But as fire-places have been superseded by cook-stoves, we must roast our meats in the oven. Take a side rib and quarter it—that is, cut it through the back-bone and ribs as near the centre as can be; then cut it across the ribs. Rub sufficient salt over it to season it (a great spoonful is enough—some like less;) then give it a good dredging of flour. Prepare a dressing like that for fowls (three pints is enough for one rib); lay the thin side, or end of the ribs, down in the dripping-pan; place the stuffing upon it, and bring the other half over. A few stitches with a darning-needle and wrapping-twine will keep the parts united firm, and when cooked, these can be easily pulled out before laying upon the platter. If the family is small one-half of the rib is enough to cook at a time. Turn a quart of water into the dripping-pan, and set it in the oven to bake.

An hour and a half is plenty long enough time to cook it. Dip the gravy over the meat occasionally, and in fifteen minutes before it is done, turn it over and allow the ribs to come on top, so as to give them a dry roast. If one does not care to go to the trouble of preparing the dressing, it can be omitted. Cook the meat just the same as if it is used. Cold baked spare-rib is one of the nicest meats that can be set on a breakfast-table, and is much more wholesome than when used hot. Either cold or hot, it is an excellent portion of the animal, and the drip that cooks from it, when cleansed, is as nice as lard for any purpose. Pork needs to be thoroughly cooked, in every form, and it is then a tolerably safe article of food.—Farmer's Wife, in Country Gentleman

TO COOK VEGETABLES.—A French cook gives the following general rules for cooking all kinds of vegetables: Green vegetables should be thoroughly washed in cold water, and then dropped into water which has been salted and is just beginning to boil. There should be a tablespoonful of salt for every two quarts of water. If the water boils a long time before the vegetables are put in, it has lost all its gases, and the mineral ingredients are deposited on the bottom and sides of the kettle, so that the water is flat and tasteless; then the vegetables will not look well or have a fine flavor. The time for boiling green vegetables depends very much upon the age and how long they have been gathered. The younger and more freshly gathered, the more quickly they are cooked. Here is a good time-table for cooking vegetables. Potatoes, boiled thirty minutes; potatoes, baked forty-five minutes; sweet potatoes, boiled forty-six minutes; sweet potatoes, baked sixty minutes; squash, boiled twenty-five minutes; squash, baked forty-five minutes; green peas, boiled from twenty to forty-five minutes; shelled beans, boiled six hours; string beans, boiled one to two hours; asparagus, fifteen to thirty minutes; tomatoes, fresh, one hour; tomatoes canned, half hour; cabbage, three quarters to one hour; beet greens, one hour; onions, one to two hours; beets, one to two hours; turnips, white, forty-five to sixty minutes; turnips, yellow, one and a half to two hours; parsnips, one to two hours; carrots, one to two hours. Nearly all these vegetables are eaten dressed with salt, pepper and butter, but sometimes a small piece of lean pork is boiled with them and seasons them sufficiently.

BROWN BREAD.—I have seen in your paper several requests for brown bread. I have read some you have published, but nearly all, I think, had soda in them. I never use that or cream of tartar in anything that can be raised with yeast, which I greatly prefer, always keeping on hand a supply of my own make. In the evening take a large milk bowl, put into it a kitchen cup not quite full of molasses, twice that quantity of luke-warm water, in which dissolve a small piece of butter, one tablespoonful of sugar and one teaspoonful of salt. Then add three-quarters of a cupful of sifted wheat flour, four and a half cupfuls of brair flour, and when it is smooth and free from all lumps, one cupful of lively yeast. I always keep a large wooden spoon for the purpose, as hard energetic beating gives it a good start in rising. Cover the bowl with a clean cloth, and set it over night in a warm place.

Early the next morning it ought to have risen nearly to the top of the bowl. Grease the pans, beat down the sponge and pour the mixture in. When light mix up to within a little of the top of the bread pans, put it into the oven, where it must be watched closely, as, owing to the molasses, it burns more quickly and cannot bear as much heat as wheat bread. When it is a nice brown, slacken down the fire by partly removing the stove lids; put it bake for an hour at least a little over, rather than any under that time. This receipt makes us a small round loaf and an oblong one. When each comes from the oven I have it rubbed with a buttered cloth which keeps the crust from getting hard, and gives a nice, glossy appearance.—Country Gentleman.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—One cup of corn meal, one of wheat flour, and four of buckwheat flour, one cup of good, sweet hop yeast; mix with sufficient warm water to make a pouring batter; let it stand over night to rise, and bake in the morning. Save a pint to start the next and keep in a cool place until wanted. If you have part milk to mix with, they will brown better.

REMOVING STAINS FROM MARBLE.—To remove stains from sanitary marble, take equal parts of fresh oil of vitriol and lemon juice; shake up these substances very thoroughly in a bottle; wet the spots with the mixture, and in a few minutes afterward rub with a soft linen cloth, and the spots will be found to have entirely disappeared.

FRIED FRITTERS.—Four eggs, one pint of milk, the rind of one grated lemon, a little salt, flour to make a light batter. Beat the eggs into the milk; add lemon, salt and flour. Fry in hot lard, and serve with sauce.

BLEEDING WART.—Touch over the bleeding surface of wart with dilute nitric acid. Apply with a feather or camel's hair brush, once every other day, or once daily, if found necessary.—New York World.

DRY BRICK WHEAT FLOUR, if repeatedly applied, will remove entirely the worst grease spots on carpets or other woolen cloth, and it will answer as well as French chalk for grease spots on silk.

SLOW BAKING OF MEATS, says Miss Corson, and baking accomplished by irregular heat, are sources of great waste of nutriment and flavor.

The simplest method to remove the hulls from corn, is to make a weak lye from clean wood ashes and soak the corn in it.

TO SELECT NUTMEGS.—Prick them with a pin. If they are good the oil will instantly spread around the puncture.

IVY POISONING.—The poisonous principle of the ivy is probably an extremely volatile one. Persons are not frequently found who are affected during the hotter months, should they pass within half a dozen feet or more of the plant with the wind blowing from it toward them. The period of greatest activity is during the flowering season—from May to October—but the effect may be produced in some cases at any period, even in winter. Susceptibility to the poison varies in different individuals, and in the same person at different times, probably being dependent on the condition of the general health. For many years I was able to handle any variety of ivy with impunity; now the slightest touch will produce decided poisonous results. I believe that the disease runs a regular constitutional course of from seven to ten days, terminating by the peeling off of the cuticle; treatment having at best but little effect, probably only modifying the severity, but hardly cutting it short. Many agents have been recommended as curative, yet they apparently are of more use in occupying the attention of the patient than of actual service as remedies against the disease. Personally, and with patients, I have exhausted a long list of reputed remedies, without real benefit. In the Southern States, where I spent several years during and after the war and where I have seen very much of extremely severe poisoning, the favorite remedies are decoctions of oak-bark and witch-hazel, neither of which ever does any good to my knowledge. After a good opportunity to watch and study the disease in my own case, I have found, that to allay the distressing torment and itching, limewater is beyond doubt at once the simplest, and the best local application. A lump of lime the size of a lemon in two quarts of water is sufficiently strong, and the parts should be thoroughly bathed, the mixture being well stirred up each time it is used. Care must be taken not to get the wash into the eyes if the face be affected. It is the better plan to wet the parts repeatedly, allowing them to dry somewhat, rather than to keep wet clothes on, as is generally done; but where the trunk is largely affected, the underclothing may be kept wet, without danger of contracting cold, if ordinary care as to exposure to draughts be observed.—Dr. W. R. D. Blackwood, in the Philadelphia Medical Times.

While animal life is abundant near the surface of the ocean, and has also been detected near the bottom at great depths, it has been doubted whether any life existed in the intermediate depths. According to Dr. J. Gwyn Jeffries, and Prof. Alexander Agassiz, the results of the late Dredging Expeditions have strongly enforced the conclusion that there is no animated intermediate zone, but that the surface fauna is really limited to a comparatively narrow belt in depth. None of the animals whose remains are found in geological formations older than the Pliocene or Upper Tertiary strata have yet been detected in any exploring expedition. The late Prof. Agassiz and Sir Wyville Thomson, says Dr. Jeffries, "were disappointed in their enthusiastic expectation of finding Ammonites, Belemnites, and other Old World fossils in a living state. I have dredged Miocene fossils on the coasts of Guernsey and Portugal, the latter at considerable depths; but they were petrifactions, and must have come from some fossiliferous formation in the adjacent land, or perhaps in the sea bed." The question as to whence the deep-sea animals get their food, has never been satisfactorily solved. No sources of vegetable supply are known at the depths at which they live, sufficient to furnish any considerable part of the amount of such food that they must require. Much doubt still exists as to the degree of light in the sea depths. The opinion that darkness prevails there is far from being scientifically established; and the contrary has not been determined. Animals living highly organized eyes have been found, as well as blind ones, and some deep-sea animals are brightly and deeply colored.

DECREASE IN THE WATER OF THE GREAT SALT LAKE.—It is well known that within a few years past the condition of the Great Basin in the interior of North America, in regard to rain-fall, has varied materially, and the percentage has been much more than heretofore; this fact being well established by greater increase in the depth of Great Salt Lake, Pyramid Lake and some others. This fact has been handled about as conclusive proof that denuding the country of its primitive forests would necessitate great climatic change.

In the healthy humid portions of the country which twenty years ago were dry and occupied by dwellings or roads are now many feet below water. At the meeting of the California Academy of Sciences, Prof. Whitney presented a communication, stating that this rise has been arrested, and that the level of the water was actually descending.

Whether this is to be a permanent change, or another alternation occurs, cannot now be foretold. It is, however, well established that the Great Salt Lake at one time occupied its entire valley, and thus was of vastly greater extent than at present. It shows also, that general laws cannot, with safety, be deduced from few or from local observations alone.

In the Hotzen Lake, near Berlin, which is of considerable depth, in some parts eighty feet, an interesting operation has been performed in the raising of sunken vessels by means of carbonic acid, a plan originated by Ebner of Vienna. In an empty balloon is inserted a vessel containing sulphuric acid, and surrounded with fused ice or salt. By turning a screw, the vessel is broken, the substances mix, and the carbonic acid, thus generated, fills the balloon which, being connected with the sunken object, raises it to the surface. In the lake in question, a small boat, weighing several hundred pounds, was first sunk. A diver with down with the apparatus, fixed it, and set it in action. Hardly was this done, when the boat appeared on the surface, held by the balloon. On another occasion, says the account given, five heavy sand bags were thrown overboard at a depth of some fifty feet; the diver went down, attached the bags to one another and to the apparatus, and the whole was successfully brought up.

WOOD THREAD.—In a New England journal we find it inforns us that the manufacture of thread from wood, for crochet and sewing purposes, has recently been started at the Abby cotton mill, near the Northoping, in the middle of Sweden. The manufacture has arrived at such a state of perfection that it can produce, at a much lower price, thread that is of as fine a quality as Clark's, and has from this circumstance been called thread "a la Clark." Orders come in faster than they can be supplied.

—Prof. C. A. Young, of Princeton, says that owing to the retarding influence of the tides on the earth's rotation, the length of the day is increasing.

Johnson's New Method for Harmony. (1.) By A. N. JOHNSON. "The best book for the world" (for its object.) was the commendation he showed by an enthusiastic pupil upon further look by the same author. However that may be, this is the newest treating, and can hardly be excelled for fullness of explanation, ease and thoroughness. It does not attempt Counterpoint, or any of the higher problems of composition; but confines itself to those that every organist, every good player, and every composer of "the peoples music," ought to know.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.
C. H. DITSON & CO.,
843 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Christian Advocate.

Some Ineradicable Evils.

It is a truth forgotten by many humanitarians, that there can be no such thing as a full attainment of the benefits they seek for man.

Progress may be made—great progress. Amelioration may be expected in the worst ills. Their task is not altogether like that of Sisyphus. The diseases under which the social body labors are chronic, and can never be entirely removed, but may be alleviated by constant care and great effort.

Perhaps as common a dream as any that floats in the golden visions of enthusiasts, is that the vice of intemperance can be eliminated from the habits of men. But we must think that this is but a dream. The battle of Abstinence and of Self-denial must be fought over again in every generation. This view of the case is doubtless a disheartening one. Many of those who are eager for this reform probably would not care for the labor, if they did not think that they were doing a work once for all. The thought of uprooting a giant evil is an inspiring one. Man love to toil for the accomplishment of some vast exploit that will never need to be done again. "I have wrought out a monument than brass more enduring," is the meed they think of. It is only the calm resolution of the patient Christian toiler which will stand up to the fight, the fight which must be ever renewed. As long as the nature of man is what it is, there will be a tendency in him as strong as gravitation to stimulate his frame with something. Alcohol, tobacco, opium, hashish drive him by force from one of these, and he will seek another. It is the shadow left in us of the transgression in the garden. Eve took the fruit of the forbidden tree, and was conscious of a new and pleasurable sensation. So her children use that which makes them "feel good." In truth, the struggle against intemperance is like that of the Hollander against the sea. Not only must the dykes be made and made like giants' ramparts, but they must be watched with sleepless vigilance, must be repaired before, and when all is done, the old and hungry sea will sometimes make a breach, and roll with fury where it often reigned alone.

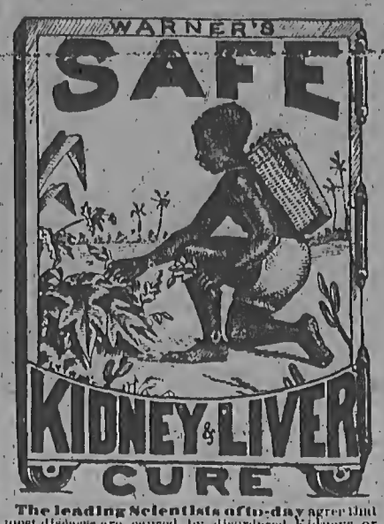
Another source of trade is the sorrow that of poverty. There are thousands of well-schemers and relief-loan sperm in all ages, and especially since the French Revolution, who think they can somehow make equal the ancient inequalities in society. But a Wiser than they says to them would time, "The poor shall never cease out of the land;" and the who became poor for our sakes has told us, "The poor we have with us always." It is a painful saying, but all the forces of man cannot make it otherwise. We are bound to help the poor, and all the more for this reason, that the eye of Him who is the poor. In the keen competition of mankind, even as under the auspices of ancient life, some must suffer. All the wild unrest, and hot rebellion, and clamorous outcry, and agrarian schemes, and social reform, can never hold the scales of life even, any more than the stormy waves of ocean can hold a ship steady on the crest of a billow. The effort at social equality is foolish, because it can never succeed. It is wicked, because it teaches the poor to think that their poverty is a crime on the part of their more fortunate neighbors. We are not to teach men that the poor should not strive to become better off, but we should teach them that God's providence has allowed them to be so, and they must seek their remedy for him.

The gospel of Christ is the true banner to be displayed against all evils. And it is the follower of Jesus, who in the long run at this sore battle, will be found to have fought hardest for humanity. Others may shout louder at the beginning, but the "staying power" is with the church of God. The well-disciplined soldier of Jesus knows the depths of the evils against which he fights. In some things he knows that the very best we can hope to do is to stand against the wiles of the devil. He cannot hope to report a final victory. That is reserved for the Captain himself, when he appears.

Under the Roman Empire there were mountaineers in Asia Minor, and in the Morea, and in Spain, who were never fully brought under Roman tribute. And even when the gospel shall have overspread the whole earth, ignorance and poverty and sickness will still be found under the sun among the children of men. After all the vast improvements in navigation since the days of Solon, the ocean still remains a terror to the sons of earth.—Watchman, Boston.

Mr. Spurgeon's Conversion.

I will tell you how I myself was brought to the knowledge of this truth. It may happen the telling of it will help some one else to Christ. It pleased God in my childhood to convince me of sin. I lived a miserable creature, finding nothing, no comfort, thinking that surely God would never save me. At last the worst came to the worst. I was miserable; I could scarcely anything. My heart was broken to pieces. Six months did I pray, prayed agonizingly with all my heart, and never had an answer. I resolved that, in the town where I lived, I would visit every place of worship in order to find out the way of salvation. I felt I was willing to do anything and do anything at God would only forgive me. I set out, determined to go around to all the chapels, and I went to all the places of worship, and though I dearly venerate the men that occupy those pulpits now, and I did so then, I am bound to say that I never heard them once fully preach the Gospel. I mean by that, they preached truth, great truths, many good truths, that were fitting to many of their congregation spiritually-minded people; but what I wanted to know was: How can I get my sins forgiven? And they never once told me that. I wanted to hear how a poor sinner, under a sense of sin, might find peace with God; and when I went I heard a sermon on "Be not deceived; God is not mocked," which cut me up worse, but did not say how I might escape. I went again another day, and the text was something about the glories of the righteous; nothing for poor me. I was something like a dog under the table, not allowed to eat the children's food. I went time after time, and I can honestly say I don't know that I ever went without prayer to God, and I am sure there was not a more attentive hearer in all the place than myself, for I panted and longed to understand how I might be saved. At last one snowy day it snowed so much I could not go to the place I had determined to go to, and I was obliged to stop on the road, and it was a blessed slip to me. I found rather an obscure street, and turned down a court, and there was a little chapel. I wanted to go somewhere, but I did not know this place. It was the Primitive Methodists' chapel. I had heard of these people from many, how they sang so loudly that they made people's heads ache; but that did not matter. I wanted to know how I might be saved, and if they made my head ache ever so much I did not care. So, sitting down, the service went on, but no minister came. At last a very thin looking man came into the pulpit and opened his Bible and read these words: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." Just settling his eyes upon me, as if he knew me all by heart, he said, "Young man, you are in trouble." Well, I was, sure enough. Says he, "You will never get out of it unless you look to Christ." And then lifting up his hands he cried out, as only I think a Primitive Methodist could do, "Look, look, look!" "It is only look," said he. I saw at once the way of salvation. Oh, how I did leap for joy at that moment! I know not what else he said; I did not take much notice of it—I was so possessed with that one thought. Like as when the brazen serpent was lifted up, they only looked and were healed. I had been waiting to do fifty things, but when I heard this word, "Look," what a charming word it seemed to me! Oh, I looked until I could almost have looked my eyes away, and in heaven I will look on still in my joy unutterable. I now think I am bound never to preach a sermon without preaching to sinners. I do think that a minister who can preach a sermon without addressing sinners does not know how to preach.



Fabulous Fungi.

A gentleman who recently had occasion to explore the chambers, drifts and caverns of the old deserted Ophir and Mexican mines, says fungi of every imaginable kind have taken possession of the old levels. In these old mines, undisturbed for years, is found a fungus world in which are to be seen counterfeits of almost everything seen in our daylight world. Owing to the warmth of the old levels and to the presence of them of a certain amount of moisture the timbers have been made to grow some curious crops. Some of the fungi in the old chambers are a yard feet in height, and being snow-white, resemble sheets of ghosts. In places one white ago a little distance appears to be white owls, and there are representations of goats with long beards, all as though carved in the purest marble. The rank fungus growths almost conceal some of the drifts. The fungi are of almost every imaginable variety of growth. Some kinds hang from the timbers like great bunches of snow-white hair, and others are great pulpy masses. These last generally rise from the rocky formation, the tops of the drifts, and seem to have grown from something dropped or spilled on the ground as the timbering work was in progress in these mines years ago. These growths have in several places raised from the ground rocks weighing from ten to fifty and even one hundred pounds. Some of the rocks have thus been lifted over three feet from the ground. In the higher levels, where the air is comparatively dry, the fungi are less massive in structure than below, and are finer in texture. Some resemble ram's horns, as they grow in a spiral or twisted shape, while others, four or five feet in length and about the thickness of a broom handle, hang from the cap timbers like sword-fish stalactites suspended by the jaws. One kind, after sending out a stem of the thickness of a pencil to the length of a foot or two appears to blossom, at least produces at the end a bulbous mass that has some resemblance to a flower. In all the infinite variety of these underground fungi it is somewhat strange that not one was seen at all like those growing in the light of day.—Nothing in the nature of tool-schools or institutions was found.—Virginia City, Nev., Enterprise.

The Olive Tree.—I challenge the unraveled English reader to tell me what the olive tree is like. I know he cannot answer my challenge. He has far more idea of an olive tree than it owns grow in the fixed stars, or than meditate a flight on them. Let me consider its strangeness, and what a wilful and constant closing of the eyes both most important truths and matters, in the air of the modern artist. Observe a want of perception, not of science. If the not want painters to tell me use of the facts of objective nature. But it would have been well for them to have got and seen the olive trees; to have loved it for Christ's sake, partly, also, for being Lawgiver's staff, which was to the believing Israelites what their double wisdom was which spoke it, to every right hand both heathenish and Christian English-speaking lover, a love like even to the heart. Landscape, as delicate foliage, subdued and faint of hue, as of the ashes of the Bethsemane only to be recognized after long years; and to have traced time for fine the writings of its minute branches, and the spotted bark work of its slight and narrow leaves, untouched the blue dust of the sky, and the small rosy white stars of its spring blossoming, and the pearls of white fruit scattered along its thinnest boughs the right, in Israel, of the stranger, the fatherless and the widow.—Nothing more than all, the saltness of the middle, silvery gray and tender, silver bloom on a bird's breast, with which, drawn, it yields them, dilations of the mountains. These it would have been well to have seen and drawn, whatever they had been instructive in thing theories.—Ruskin.

A Touching Romance.—A number of years ago one Jameson, in Wales, in exploring a cave for flint, had been closed, found the body of a young man dressed in a fashion long out of date. The peculiar design of the suit of the time was such as to preserve the body so perfectly that it appeared asleep rather than dead. The coroner were puzzled at the circumstance; no one in the district had been missed within their remembrance, and at last it was resolved to bring in the oldest inhabitant, an old lady long past her eighties (oh year, who had lived single in the village the whole of her life. On being taken into the presence of the body a very strange scene occurred. The old lady fell on the corpse, kissed it, and addressed it by every term of endearment spoken in the language of a by-gone generation. He was her early love, she had waited for him during her long life. She knew he had not proved false to the heart, and so she had kept herself pure for him. Then, as she gazed on the features, so delicate, so full of life, as if the ashes of the Bethsemane only to be recognized after long years; and to have traced time for fine the writings of its minute branches, and the spotted bark work of its slight and narrow leaves, untouched the blue dust of the sky, and the small rosy white stars of its spring blossoming, and the pearls of white fruit scattered along its thinnest boughs the right, in Israel, of the stranger, the fatherless and the widow.—Nothing more than all, the saltness of the middle, silvery gray and tender, silver bloom on a bird's breast, with which, drawn, it yields them, dilations of the mountains. These it would have been well to have seen and drawn, whatever they had been instructive in thing theories.—Ruskin.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The leading Scientists of to-day agree that most diseases are caused by disordered Kidneys or Liver. If, therefore, the Kidneys and Liver are kept in perfect order, perfect health will be the result. This truth has only been known a short time, and for years people suffered great agony without being able to find relief. The discovery of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure marks a new era in the treatment of these troubles. Made from a simple tropical fruit of rare value, it contains just the elements necessary to nourish and invigorate both of these great organs, and safely restore and keep them in order. It is a POSITIVE Remedy for all the diseases that cause pains in the lower part of the body—for Torpid Liver—Headaches—Jaundice—Dizziness—Gravel—Fever, Ague—Malarial Fever, and all difficulties of the Kidneys, Liver and Urinary Organs.

It is an excellent and safe remedy for Females during Pregnancy. It will control Menstruation, and is invaluable for Leucorrhœa or Falling of the Womb.

As a blood purifier it is unequaled, for it cures the diseases that make the blood.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,
Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.
Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—results of analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proved by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of pleasing novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to derive more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., April 12.—The State Medical Association met here at twelve o'clock to-day and organized. An address was delivered to-night by Dr. Baldwin, of Huntsville. A large number of doctors are here, and many others are expected to-night.

MACON, Ga., April 12.—Thirty special reports to the Telegraph and Messenger, indicate less than half a peach crop in Middle and Southwestern Georgia, the fig trees killed, plums half a crop, pears and cherries badly damaged, apples and strawberries not much injured. The Lecompe pear is a failure in some sections.

MEMPHIS, April 12.—The Appeals' Hernando, Miss., special says: A severe wind storm passed over this country, one mile north of Hernando, this afternoon, blowing down houses, trees, etc. Dr. A. Landerdale and wife were severely injured. Several negroes are reported killed, but owing to the swollen creeks we cannot obtain fuller particulars.

Hernando is twenty miles south of Memphis.

IOWA CITY, Iowa, April 12.—Miss Hattie Denell, the fasting girl, died at noon yesterday and was buried this afternoon. Immediately after death a post mortem examination was made by Dr. Cowperthwaite, Dean of the Homeopathic Department of the University. Not a drop of blood was found in the body, which weighed forty-five pounds. The stomach was also entirely void of any substance. No further particulars have yet been made public.

NEWBURGH, N. Y., April 12. The trial of Beaumont B. Buck, of Texas, now a cadet at West Point, for the shooting of John G. Thompson, Jr., last June, at Highland Falls, was begun this afternoon in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, now in session in this city, Judge Cullen, presiding. A jury was secured and the case was opened for the people. The first witness will be sworn to-morrow morning.

VERMILLONVILLE, April 13.—Hon. Edward Eugene J. Monton, Judge of the Twenty-Fifth Judicial District, died at his residence near here to-day, after a protracted illness. He was serving his second term of office.

DALLAS, April 13. An interesting piece of news with certain well informed persons here, is to the effect that this morning, at their meeting in Philadelphia, the directors of the Texas Pacific elected Jay Gould, President, and H. M. Hoxie, General Superintendent. The latter's appointment, to succeed Uriarge Noble, excites the chief interest, and is regarded in the light of progress of a scheme of vast consolidation of Gould's Southwestern lines. Mr. Hoxie, who holds a similar position in the International management, will, it is thought, be elected at once to be general superintendent of the Iron Mountain Road.

MEMPHIS, April 13.—The Appeal's Hernando, Miss., special gives the following particulars of the tornado which devastated the country yesterday. The cyclone did serious damage, Commencing a mile north of Hernando, it struck Mr. Ryley's steam gin, completely destroying it and carrying away a wagon, team and driver included, landing them in a ditch half a mile distant. His blacksmith shop was also carried some distance. Frank Howard's house was carried nearly one hundred feet yards, but not injured. L. Robertson's house was blown down. Jim Hunter's cabin was next struck, killing Lize Evans and stunning two children, who have not spoken since. The house was torn to pieces and covered by fallen trees.

Dan Glover's cabin, on the Bank's place was blown to pieces, severely injuring him and his wife, and killing one child; Glover is not expected to live. Mrs. Humphrey's house was swept away and two persons wounded by falling timbers. Bob. Lackland's house was also demolished. The tornado next blew down Johnston & Co.'s, and A. D. Lauderdale's stores, totally demolishing them, strewing their goods for miles.

Dr. Lauderdale's residence was also razed to the ground, dangerously wounding the doctor and his wife.

Three hundred yards further on a negro cabin was swept away.

The Lauderdale House is blown down and beyond that, another cabin. John Chamberlain's stables and outhouses were demolished. L. Gear's dwelling was leveled, and all the cabins on Will Johnston's place were swept away.

Crossing Camp Creek bottom, the cyclone blew down Ben. Harwell's house, instantly killing him; his wife and child escaped unhurt. The track of the tornado is about one hundred yards wide.

Deputy Sheriff Sikes Johnston was caught and blown off his horse, which was carried in the air, and had both legs broken. Mr. Heflin says he saw a man in the air, and one or two reported missing. Men were blown all over the fields like barrels and nearly beat to death against the ground. Many farms are totally demolished.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., April 14.—Work will commence in a few days on the Montgomery Southern railroad, and it will be rapidly pushed forward to connect with the Pensacola and Atlantic railroad at some point in Florida.

YANKTON, April 14.—It has been ascertained that the gorge which has caused the flood upon the bottom lands extends from Yankton to Vermillion filling the river for more than thirty miles with solid ice, which rises in places to the height of thirty feet above the surface of the water. Nothing but extremely warm weather or the use of powerful explosives will release it.

MEMPHIS, April 14. Dr. A. D. Landerdale, who was wounded by the blowing down of his house Tuesday, near Hernando, Miss., died to-day. The same cyclone was destructive in the neighborhood of Commerce, Miss., destroying cotton gins, cabins, fences, trees, etc. H. W. Fly's store in Commerce, was unroofed and the stock of goods damaged by water to the extent of $3000.

NEW YORK, April 15.—Bradstreet's will publish to-morrow a summary of the cotton situation, with regard to both the old and new crop, down to the close of March. Port receipts and overland movement for both was 481,315, against 1,959,191 for the same time last year, an excess of 22,451. Estimating the receipts for the season the same as last year, gross actual yield for the crop of 1881, of 6,283,163.

As yet there are no indications of any sudden falling off in receipts. The stock at interior towns is no less than a year ago. The port receipts for the first twelve days in April have been 48,000 more than for the same time last year. Estimating the probable increase of receipts during the remainder of the year, the total yield is placed at 6,422,000 bales.

NEW YORK, April 16. The Chronicle's telegrams report all cotton above ground in Texas killed by frost, and replanting necessary, from same cause, in portions of Alabama and Mississippi.

NEW YORK, April 18.—A dispatch from Chewacla Lime Kilns, Lee county, Ala., says: A cyclone passed over this place yesterday, sweeping everything in its course. Many houses were unroofed, and the house of W. H. Howard was completely torn to pieces. A heavy wagon in his yard was lifted in the air and carried seventy yards. No one was killed.

DANVILLE, Va., April 18.—The Virginia Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has concluded its labors. Yesterday Bishop Daniel A. Payne, D.D., (colored) preached, by invitation, at the Main Street Methodist Episcopal Church, (white,) which is the largest and wealthiest church of that denomination in Virginia. Bishop Payne was formerly President of Wilberforce University, in Ohio. He was assisted yesterday in the services by Prof. Johns, from West Indies, and Ehler Lloyd, both colored. The church was filled with a white and colored people.

FOREIGN.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 12.—Earthquakes of considerable violence have begun again in Chio. It is estimated that barely twenty-houses remain habitable in the whole island. Forty-five villages have been totally destroyed, and the population in many localities has absolutely disappeared.

BERLIN, April 14.—The famous anti-Jewish petition was sent to Prince Bismarck yesterday. It consists of twenty-six volumes, comprising 14,000 sheets, with 255,000 signatures, including those of noblemen, retired generals and officials.

CHIO, April 11.—The latest returns state that 2000 were killed and 10,000 injured by the recent earthquakes.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 16.—Advices from Bagdad state that the ravages of the plague are terrible though not extending beyond the sanitary cordon. Four thousand inhabitants have quitted Nedjed and encamped in salubrious localities. Nedjed and Djidjara were burned on the 6th inst. The disease has become most virulent the afflicted dying in ten hours after being attacked.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., April 15.—At a meeting of the Louisville presbytery of the Presbyterian Church South, this morning, Dr. Stuart Robinson resigned his position as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, giving as the reason, his age and failing health, which make it impossible for him to bear the toil and trouble of active ministerial duties.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 15.—All the Nihilists except the woman Hessy Helfman, condemned to death for connection with the Czar's assassination, namely: Russakoff, Michaloff, Kibaltschitsch, Mirbach and Sophie Pieofsky were hanged at 10.0 o'clock this morning. Michaloff's rope broke twice. Order was not disturbed. There was an immense concourse of spectators.

LONDON, April 16, 5:30 A. M.—Lord Beaconsfield is dead.

THE NEW ORLEANS PACIFIC.—In a short conversation, says the Shreveport Standard, of April 9, with Maj. B. H. Greene, who has just returned from New Orleans, we learned that work on the New Orleans Pacific was progressing favorably. Eight hundred tons of rails has already arrived at Alexandria, and more will be pushed forward as rapidly as possible. The road has been reinforced with laborers all along the line, and track-laying will be commenced from four different points, thereby assuring the completion of the road through to New Orleans by at least the first of September. An engine and some cars will be shipped to Alexandria by steamer next Saturday, to be employed in track-laying.

A cotton gin and press on wheels manufactured by a New Haven company, worked successfully in Texas, last season. With this apparatus may be handled daily 10,000 pounds of seed cotton. The cotton is compressed into small bales of about one hundred and twenty-five pounds each, or quarter bales. These bales are superior in many respects to the large rumbroon bales now in use. The daily output of this gin press is about twenty-five of these small bales. Our cotemporary, Cotton, unrivalled and unapproached in its sphere of usefulness as an exponent of cotton interests and the vast industrial concerns identified with them, has an extended notice of the new invention and photographs of it may be seen at this office.—America.

NATIONAL WEALTH. It is stated, on good authority, that the annual increase of wealth in England is $325,000,000; in France, $375,000,000; in Germany, $200,000,000; and in the United States, $825,000,000. In the total valuation of property, the United States ranks third on the list of the great Western nations. The property of England is valued at $44,000,000,000; that of France at $30,710,000,000; and that of the United States at $33,000,000,000. So much for the aggregate wealth, and the annual increase of it in each of these favored countries. As our annual increase is nearly three times the amount of that of either of the two countries named in our statement, we shall soon be as rich as the richest; and after a while how much richer than the richest our moderate supply of figures would hardly enable us to compute.—Philadelphia Methodist.

DEATH RATE. If five and a half per cent. die every year, it is equivalent to one eighteenth of the population per year, so that in eighteen years they would all be dead, and the average life of man would therefore, have to be eighteen years. But as man on the average only propagates between the ages of twenty and forty-six, the average duration of life must lie between, say thirty-three; so the average mortality in order to keep up the native population without addition from abroad, must be one in thirty-three per year, or three per cent. This corresponds with three generations per century. The births have of course to keep up with the deaths, and not be less, as is now the case in France; but they can never amount to five and a half per cent. If people were to be born and die so fast as that, every generation would be extinguished in eighteen years.

The Bank of England was incorporated in 1649. It covers five acres of ground and employs nine hundred clerks. There are no windows on the street. Light is admitted through open courts; no mob could take the bank, therefore, without cannon to batter the impense walls. The clock in the centre of the bank has fifty dials attached to it. Large cisterns have been sunk in the court, and engines in perfect order are always in readiness in case of fire.

THE CHORISTER

BY F. D. WEATHERLY

Our Foreign Missions.

The Advocate of Missions, edited and published by the Missionary Secretary, Dr. Wilson, is a grand missionary paper. From the April number we give some interesting excerpts:

Wilson, writing of his recent trip to Mexico, says:

"Each day of our stay added to the interest awakened as we saw more and more clearly the opportunities opened, and witnessed the urgency and untiring labor of our superintendent to satisfy all the demands of his position. Our prudent counsels as to his health were met by us and simple statements of the work made upon him, enough to convince two men of stalwart vigor and energy. The work grows on his hands. There is now within his district, and more than all, that he can attend to. A new center of operations must soon be established, and will be located northward until the confines of the Mexican Border Mission be reached, when with the Central Mexican Mission. Every day the antagonism to the Protestant movement weakens. The government has put its power in the way of fanatical violence, and much of the people is shaking itself from the slavery of priest-craft and superstition. The channels are opening, and the waters of life begin to flow freely into every nook and corner of the land. The missions have settled into agreements which obviate the necessity for collisions, and labor harmoniously toward the end, the salvation of all the people. Free pulpits, true Christian living, devoted, loving Christians will soon bring their power to bear upon the scattered multitudes; then nothing will be wanting but a revolution of power from on high without which the most plans, most generous expenditure, most faithful labor, will be of no avail.

"We are blessed in our representatives in the Mexican Mission work. Each one of them is an honor to the church. They ought to be fully sustained by unceasing prayer in their behalf and by such contributions as will enable them to make the footing wherever they enter in their Master's name.

"On our way to Vera Cruz we stopped a day and night at Orizaba, an opportunity to look in upon the church there, and to the Bishop and Deacon Severiano Gallegas, the teacher in charge at that place. We must resist the temptation to recite scenes, and defer much that we long to say to another time.

"Elias Robertson, writing from Laredo, Texas, of the Mexican Border Mission, says:

"We have prayer-meeting on Wednesday nights, at which I always make a short talk. Our American Sunday-school is the most interesting ever saw. We have six faithful teachers, who are earnestly endeavoring to make good impressions upon the minds and hearts of those whom they are instructing. Our need is means with which to purchase literature. Our preaching follows the Sunday school. I usually preach from the text of the Sunday-school lesson.

"The Mexicans have service on Tuesday, Thursday, and Sunday nights. Also Sunday school and preaching Sunday morning. It does my heart good to see them, old and young, engaged in worship. Though I can not understand what they say, I like to hear them tell of the goodness of God in bringing them to the true light. Their language has a sacred melody, and their songs are musical indeed. O how I long to learn the language! It is one of the absolute, indispensable necessities for any one here to speak it. Imagine yourself in a mighty multitude, wishing to speak but can not, desiring to hear but can not understand. I feel I am virtually excluded from many places because I can not enter their humble homes and address them in their native tongue. I am making some progress, however; but it seems there are so many things in connection with my work to claim my attention, and occupy my time, that I can not make that rapid advancement in the acquisition of the Spanish which I desire to make.

"Rev. A. P. Parker writes from Shanghai, China, October 11:

"During the year, too, we have had, on the whole, enlarged congregations—especially so at Trinity; a deeper interest there and at Christmas Chapel among the women; an increased number of inquirers, and a goodly ingathering of probationers throughout the bounds of our work; while some very staunch believers have been added to the church. One of our most faithful preachers and several members have been removed from our midst, but we are thankful to say that in every case there was substantial ground for hope, and some died triumphing in the gospel—a matter of profound astonishment to heathen friends and a powerful confirmation of the truths of Christianity in the hearts of believing spectators. So marked, indeed, has been this testimony, and so profound the weight of conviction conveyed thereby, that we have been led to attribute as much benefit to this means of preaching Christ as has been the result of an equal number of the most powerful sermons that have been delivered from the pulpit during the twelve-month.

"Rev. W. W. Royall, writes from China, January 17:

"The Nantziang work promises healthy expansion, and Brother Reid seemed hopeful of the outcome this year. His new parsonage is a model of comfort and convenience, as well as of durability. We would do well to have many such. It is excellently built, and will last doubtless several generations. The girls school seems to be doing well under the faithful care of the Misses Rankin. Would that we had scores of ladies of such piety and intelligence! They are at home plenty of them but they are burying their talent. May God's Spirit draw them here, where they can multiply it a hundred fold! O how this land cries out for help! It is agonizing to see the moral wretchedness of these people.

"In Shanghai, too, we hope for better things when we get our new church completed. It is proposed to put it on the lot where we now have the old 'Christmas Chapel,' the Chapel School, and the dwelling so long occupied by our dear Brother Landuth. This place is well known to the Chinese both in Shanghai and also far into the interior. It is called 'Dzangka 'troh 'dzau,' or the 'Dzang family wooden bridge.' The name is quite familiar out here. Hence the new church would be already well known, and would, therefore, be advantageously located. A new residence is needed, and we are trying hard to get a lot some two furlongs or a mile to the north of this place, so as to be in a rapidly growing part of the city, and one more favorable to health than the location we now occupy. The place we now have is not a healthful one, and it is a matter of urgent necessity to get a better location. Upon this may depend the presence of some of us here; for health is absolutely necessary. Land is excessively high, however, and we need a good place. I hope the church will come manfully to the rescue. Dr. Allen's church is well and strongly built, pretty and attractive. They have an excellent organ; and it is a great attraction to the Chinese. The latter make admirable music themselves, but seem to have a taste for that which is good. So, taken altogether, the prospect is cheering. The missionaries seem all in good heart, and that counts for much.

"Rev. C. F. Reid, January 31, from Nantziang, China, writes of a trip made in company with Dr. Allen:

"We reached Chiing-poo, Saturday afternoon. Leaving the Doctor on the boat, I went in search of Dzang—our native preacher—whom I found busily engaged arranging our new chapel for Sunday service. We have never had a fair chance at this place, for two reasons: first, the Catholics are very strong; second, we were only able to secure a remote, out-of-the-way place for our chapel. Yet some of our best workers are the fruit of our labor here. This year I determined, if possible, to secure a more favorable location, and enlarge the work, by opening a day school for boys. After considerable cautious inquiry, the right place was found and secured. It is admirably suited to our work, being located on one of the principal streets, and is large enough to furnish room for chapel, school and room for preacher and teacher, both of whom are on the ground, ready to begin work with the new Chinese year. Sunday morning Dr. Allen preached the opening sermon. The chapel was literally packed. At first they filled the seats, but as the people crowded in to hear, those who were seated were compelled to stand, in order to make room for others. And there they stood for an hour, many of them giving the closest attention to the Doctor's discourse. We left Chiing-poo the next morning, feeling that our chances for doing good were much improved.

"About one o'clock P. M. we arrived in Kading. No special changes have taken place here since last writing. We have three schools—two for boys, and one for girls—all three are in a prosperous condition. Lee, the native preacher, is a man of great earnestness and marked ability. Of late he has been doing a great deal of country work, in the way of preaching and selling books. This pleases me very much—all the more because it is his own idea, and indicates a disposition to do all he can.

"Some changes have been made in Nantziang since writing my last letter. Dsan Tsz Zek (C. K.) Marshall is my assistant this year. To make room for him, I was compelled to add two rooms to the native parsonage. I also made some necessary repairs on the chapel; for, though we hope this will be the last year we shall use it as such, we could not avoid doing some patching, even for so short a time. I never felt the need of a new church more than I did yesterday. Long before the appointed time for Sunday school it was found that the crowd was to great for our usual exercises. So we made no attempt to hear the classes. Brother Marshall began to preach to them. In less than five minutes there was not space enough in the church for one small boy to squeeze in—both the aisle and the space around the pulpit being packed. I went and stood in the front door during the whole sermon, to keep the crowd outside from pressing in on the already too densely packed congregation. It is not every day that we have such crowds as we had yesterday, but they often fill the house till there is not even standing-room; and if we had a large, commodious house, I am sure many more would attend regularly.

"Dr. Allen writes of a very interesting missionary tour in China. We give an extract:

"Accordingly, when the time came, I set out with Brother Reid, presiding elder of the Nantziang District, and first visited Tsung-pu, where I preached for him on the occasion of opening a new and more commodious preaching-place in that flourishing little city. Thence we went on to this home at Nantziang, where I left Brother Reid, and picked up Brother Mclain and my little son, Arthur, who had gone so far, sixty miles overland. We then visited Kading, one of our first stations, a walled city some twenty-four miles from Shanghai, and thence on by Tsingpu to the large prefectural city of Sung Kiang (Song Kong), where Brother McLain had an opportunity to see, for the first time, the place which it was hoped to see himself and wife occupy.

"Returning from this trip, after some few days' absence we picked up Brother Loehr to our number, and set out for a more extended tour, during which we visited Woigdai village, at which Brother Reid has a preaching-place, and Kwan Shan, a city of fifth rate, near Suchow, where we have a native preacher stationed in connection with the Suchow District. Thence we went on to Suchow, the great capital of this province, where Brother Parker 'hobbs the fort.' Here Brother Loehr's eyes were opened and his ears too, for that matter, for the welcome accorded him by the hoodlums and scalawags was as unusual as unexpected. From every street, thoroughfare, alley and lane, poured forth a continuous stream of boys, released from school by the Chinese New Year, and every boy yelled at the top of his voice, not, 'Yankee Doodle's come to town,' as the Bedouins did when I landed at the foot of the great pyramid in Egypt, but Yang-kuay-tsz, Yang-kuay-tsz, Lah liz loong, Lah liz loong, which, being interpreted, means, 'The devil's come to town! A thief! a thief!' Brother Loehr, however, was too modest to think it all intended for him self, as did the late William H. Seward, who, when entering the city of Peking, mistook a funeral procession to be an imperial escort, sent to greet, and went so far as to place himself in an attitude to receive an address of welcome from the emperor.

"After keeping Sabbath in the mission churches there, and spending one day in visiting the chief points of interest in the city, we again set sail, this time for the lake and mountain region near by, where we had the opportunity of seeing some of the finest temples—Buddhist and Taoist—in this part of the empire.

A Voice from Texas.

Away out here on the frontier of civilization, as is thought by the people of the "States," we are in full sympathy with the extraordinary advanced movement of the public mind all over Christendom upon the great subject now intensifying the antagonism to legislation, legalizing the iniquitous and disastrous liquor traffic.

We believe that "prohibition does prohibit," albeit the "wish is father to thought," that it does not, as assumed by the representatives of the liquor advocates in the face of the attesting and incontrovertible facts demonstrated by experiment, which is of more value than any dogmatic assumption predicated upon the perversion of these facts. Anyhow, our people groaning under the intolerable incubus of a licensed traffic, are determined to throw off the burden imposed by a legislation in the interest of grog shops at their expense. They dance, but the people have to pay the fiddler. The wonder is they have borne it so long in silence. But they are fully aroused now, here and everywhere, and woe, politically, to him, as a legislator, that would interpose the barrier of a disgusting and false plea that "prohibition invades private rights, antagonizes the spirit of liberty, coerces morality and religion, and all that kind of balderdash. We have it ad nauseam over here from the representatives of the infidel whisky ring, subsidized by that clique which will be swept away as chaff before the tempest. A little common sense without any great pretension of being learned in the law, distinctly comprehends that all law is predicated upon the recognition of the elementary principle that private rights are subordinate to community rights, and must yield precedence.

No man can claim legislation in his favor at the public expense. Sumptuary laws are not invoked by the people clamoring for the abolition of the liquor traffic, to save society from utter wreck and ruin. They demand, and mean to enforce, it, that they shall not be taxed beyond their powers of endurance to sustain a traffic, in the interest of those who fatten upon the woes of humanity at the expense of the taxpayer. If law was not instituted to protect society from the demoralization of crime by police regulations; then what are its functions? And what so prolific of crime as the grog shop, the "pint law" and all such abominations, that should be swept from the statute book, as a disgrace and shame to the civilization of the age.

Such law makers must and will be ousted from legislative halls by the outraged moral sense of our trusted constituency. The time is not distant, when all over this broad land, the people in their majesty will sweep from power and place, those who are not the exponents of their will, stern and unrelenting, but the subsidised tools of grog shops, their aids and abettors. Texas is wide awake and duly solvent, and the small minority in our last legislature, who, in the interest of the whisky ring, prevented the expression of the will of the people, at the ballot box will be buried deep beneath their indignation.

Glad to know that my own, my native land is being stirred profoundly on this great subject, involving so much of weal or woe to untold millions; and that such men as the gifted Steele, Galloway and Hunnicutt, and such practical legislators as McNeil, and matter of fact men as Conroy are found battling for the great cause, which, may God defend.

No one is personated in this article, except as the representative of a class who antagonize the extraordinary moral movement, simultaneously stirring the hearts of philanthropists.

Arkansas Correspondence.

MR. EDITOR: You did me the kindness to say that it seemed unnatural for me to be in Arkansas, intimating that I would be missed in Alabama.

I must say at first I felt as if I were some distance from home, but now I feel very differently. Last Saturday was a high day with me. I had the unexpected pleasure of meeting Rev. W. D. Davis of the Little Rock Conference. We were together in the army, he being chaplain of the First Arkansas Regiment. We came home from the army together, joined the Montgomery Conference at the same time and for three years were class-mates. He then transferred to this state and I had lost sight of him. I really did not expect to meet him any more this side the better land; when, to my great joy he came with Bro. Johnson to the Quarterly meeting, and introduced himself as the same man I had known so long and loved so much. We talked much, especially of the Army of Tennessee and Alabama Methodism.

I have found this to be a fine field for usefulness, and to those who are interested in the matter, I say that I am well pleased with this country. The Methodist Church is strong, numerically and otherwise covering the ground she stands on tolerably well, needing some amendment to her theory and practice, I think. I was not at all pleased though, when I learned how my transfer was made. According to the direction of the Bishop, letters were written by men who knew me well and were above suspicion, as lovers of the church, and sent in care of the Western Methodist in due time for the Conference; but it so happened that they did not reach the seat of the Conference at all. They learned by some means that I was expecting to transfer, so they strained a point and crosslifted me in at the back door, or as my presiding elder expressed it to my wife, "they took rough at a venture." I was greatly mortified when I learned how the matter stood, but there was no help for it then.

Bishop Pierce ventured however, to give me a good circuit having now twelve appointments and the prospect of others; and financial ability to raise $2,000 for church purposes. I also found a good parsonage, and since my arrival have raised and expended $100 00 for furniture and some much needed repairs. So we are now quite as comfortable as ever we were on the other side of the river, which is saying a great deal. There are more regular class and prayer-meetings held and I believe more family altars than any circuit I have ever traveled. It seems to me that more preachers are needed here of a certain class. Alas, for the vineyard, that class can not well be spared from the East, or any where else. I refer to those preachers that come up fully to the Marvin standard: "Men that love God and not money; that have souls and not their race." As to the whisky question, I am glad to say, it is an open field and a square fight, money on one side, and a vast multitude of earnest workers that love God and humanity on the other. Great changes have already taken place for the better.

It is indeed refreshing to walk to the Postoffice here and see that piece of goods box tacked over the sign, "Star Saloon." It saluted me a few times after my arrival, but thanks to a kind Providence it salutes me no more. So may it ever be. This is certainly a good country for farmers. Pork could hardly be sold at three cents per pound, and farm hands are eagerly sought after, and paid from $12 50 to $15 00 per month.

The Pine Bluff and Camden railroad is to be built this year, which will be a great advantage to this part of the State. Yours truly,

W. W. GRAHAM.

PRESCOTT, Arkansas, April 6, 1881.

From Shreveport, Louisiana.

MR. EDITOR: About ten days ago, we organized Caddo Lodge No. 18, of Independent Order of Good Templars. I am informed that this is the first move in the good cause of temperance that has been made in Shreveport in a number of years. From the character and members of the organizers of Caddo Lodge, we have every reason to believe that the war on intemperance, that "surpassing evil" as Dr. Mathews calls it, having been inaugurated, will be vigorously and uncompromisingly prosecuted to a glorious issue. There is already considerable esprit de corps exhibited by the young men who have devoted themselves to sober lives and, to the untiring effort to persuade others to do the same. I regard this organization as the lighting of a bright light to shine in a dark place. The other side have had it all their own way long enough and it is indeed a hopeful sign that some of those who believe that Whisky & Co. should not control social, business and public life have at last awakened to the necessity of doing something more than theorizing, having determined hereafter to practice what they preach, and live what they believe.

The farmers all around are just now quite busy and are, we believe, having weather favorable to their operations.

Shreveport air is always full of railroad matters, and there is scarcely an issue of our local papers without some news in it, on this live subject. What I get out of it all is, that it will not be many months before we can go the Crescent City all the way by car, and that the gap between this city and Monroe will be rated at an early date.

As to our church, I can certainly report that everything is moving on well. The congregations are attentive, and the "glorious gospel of the blessed God" is having its effect. There have been some conversions and additions, and the class and prayer-meetings are steadily increasing in interest and spiritual results. Of Conference collections, we have taken the mite for Centenary College, and the one for Foreign Missions, the people acting most generously in each case. It is to be hoped that the brethren will not forget to raise their Centenary money. A few days since we began to get subscriptions for the building of the new church, I am glad to report that our success, so far, is most gratifying. It looks as if a beautiful new church for the Methodists of Shreveport, will have its foundation laid in the not distant future. By faith, prayer and willing, loving sacrifices it will be done. Pray that God may be with his people in Shreveport in all that they undertake for his glory.

Good Words.

The day lies slowly in the western sky;
The sunset splendor fades, and wan and cold
The far peaks wait the sunrise, cheerily
The gold-haired cedar lifts its wanderers to their fold.
My weary soul, that faith would cease to roam
Take comfort, evening bringeth all things home

Homeward the swift-winged sea-gull takes its flight,
The sliding tide breaks softly on the sands;
The red sailed boats draw shoreward for the night
The shadows deepen over sea and lands;
Be still, my soul! Hides home—the heart's desire—
Behold, one evening God will call thee home.

WHAT LIFE HATH.

Life hath its barren years,
When blossoms fall untimely down,
When ripened fruitage fails to crown
The Summer toil, when Nature's frown
Looks only on our tears.

Life hath its faithless days,
The golden promise of the morn,
That seemed for light and gladness born,
Meant only moon-tide wreck and scorn,
Hushed harp instead of praise.

Life hath its valleys, too,
Where we must walk with vain regret,
With mourning clothed, with wild rain wet,
Towards sunlight hopes that soon must set,
All quenched in pitying dew.

Life hath its harvest moons,
Its tasseled corn and purple-weighted vine;
Its gathered sheaves of grain, the blessed sign
Of plenteous ripening, bread and pure rich wine,
Full hearts for harvest tunes.

Life hath its hopes fulfilled,
Its glad fruitions, its blest answered prayer,
Sweeter for waiting long, whose holy air,
Indrawn to silent souls, breathes forth its rare,
Grand speech by joy distilled.

Life hath its Tabor heights,
Its lofty mounts of heavenly recognition,
Whose unveiled glories flash to earth munition
Of love and truth and clear fulfillment,
Hush'd mount of all delights.

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN ROSENIUS.

Second Quarter Lesson VI.

GOLDEN TEXT: "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee." Luke 15:18.

SUNDAY, MAY 8, 1881. LUKE XV. 11-24.

11. And he said, A certain man had two sons:

12. And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living.

13. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.

14. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want.

15. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country, and he sent him into his fields to feed swine.

16. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat, and no man gave unto him.

17. And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!

18. I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee,

19. And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants.

20. And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.

21. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.

22. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet:

23. And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry:

24. For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry.

The three parables of the lost sheep, the lost piece of money and the prodigal son must be considered together as one great lesson setting forth the same great truth. The great truth is God's mercy in saving the lost. This is set forth in the first two parables—the lost sheep and the lost piece of money—from the side of God's sovereign grace. In the last, that of the prodigal son, from the side of man's free will. In the former God's work is displayed; in the latter, man's; and yet they are all one, for we may say that the wandering sheep is not brought home against his own will; and, on the other hand, the prodigal son would never have arisen and returned had not God's grace sought him out and given him the will and then the power to do so. It is to be regretted that these parables should have been separated by apices in the international series. These pearls are to be seen best as the divine Artist has grouped them. None of the parables of our Lord have suffered more at the hands of the gilders of fine gold than these, especially the last one.

The drapery of this exquisite picture has been pressed out of all shape by often and unskillful handling. It has been subjected to microscopic investigation, until the very threads of the canvas upon which it is limned can be seen, and the marks of the hairs of the brush have been detected, and mistaken for part of the picture. The great truths intended to be portrayed have been lost in the study of the mere detail. It has been gazed in by men who saw, like the man who, looking long and intently upon a majestic monument, forgot to notice its awful height and commanding beauty, for the interest he took in the image of a dog at its base, which the sculptor had put there as a mere scale of measure.

So are some of the critics of this parable.

Verse 11. And he said, A certain man had two sons. Remember the charge against which Christ was defending himself was: "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." The complaint against him was, too great friendliness to sinners, and too little regard for the just. He has already answered them by an appeal to common sense, or rather to common consciousness. The difference in his conduct toward them, the just, and toward sinners, is to be accounted for in the very difference of their respective relations to him as a Saviour of sinners. A Shepherd would act very differently toward a lost sheep from the way he would act toward those in the fold. The money changer would regard in very different ways the coins safe under lock and the one lost in the dark room. That all the anxiety of the shepherd should go out after the lost sheep, and all the care of the money owner should be centered on the lost piece, and that the sheep in the fold, and money in the strong box, should be for the time forgotten is no wonder, but just what should be expected under the circumstances.

But the divine Artist paints a third scene, in which the relation between a person and a person, and not the relation between a person and a living thing, or the relation between a person and a value, is made the illustration of the relation existing between God and a sinner, out of which grows the infinite mercy of our Heavenly Father to you and me as sinners.

The central figure in this last scene is a father, a forgiving, indulgent, loving father. It is not the prodigal boy, nor is it the son, who was this father's stay at home, not the mansion, not the servants and the feast and the rejoicing; these are all in the picture, but they are put there to bring out in clear relief the Father. When the Master, by his divine touch, finished this most beautiful picture in all the gospels, so beautiful that it storms the strongest fortress of the soul, and makes its way to the sympathy of the rudest, and surprises the most callous into the emotion which finds its best relief in tears, he did not, like some rude artist, label it, "This is the prodigal son." This is man's work, and, as is always the result when man attempts to improve upon the Maker's work, the original is only marred. Let the name go, and look at the picture from a better standing-point of view.

A picture of a man who had two sons, one that gave the father little trouble, and the other, the younger, that cost him much. The most of the history is taken up by the younger son, because this is the history of a father's heart, and this younger son held the largest place in his father's heart, simply because he was in more danger and trouble than his brother, who was the more gifted in character. The history of this younger son, acted out by him in a thoughtless, unconscious way, was from the very first a dreadful experience in the father's bosom. The swift movement of the prodigal from home and plenty to beggary in a far country, by a strange fascination, distracts our attention from the father, but he really is the great actor in this tragedy of a life wasted, and all but lost forever. The father's heart, by the prophetic power of a father's love, ran through the entire roll of the son's part in the drama, besides running out a thousand others just as alluring. His yearning soul, in love for his boy, ran out the whole dreadful length of every path to death in search of his son, until his love found him, and, by many a weary step, drew him back to a son's place in the old home.

The Golden Text gives us the right point of view: "I will arise and go to my father." God regards a sinner as this father regarded the prodigal. We are then to remember, through all the wanderings of this son, a father's love follows him. The sinner has God for his Father, and nothing that he can do will destroy this relationship, while, at the same time, it is in the power of the son to so ignore this relationship as to lose all its blessings and turn them into curses. Keep before you the thought of the relationship—God's ownership in every man. The lost sheep belongs to the man who seeks it; the lost money to the woman who lights the candle to find it; the prodigal son belongs to the father, by a stronger tenure than that of mere possession, even by the love of a father.

He is a son, a member of the family; not a stranger. Christ does not picture the one son born in the happy home, and the other as belonging to a different family, and having to be taught at length the happiness of the good father's house, and seek admission to it; he is already in it. He goes away from it. Thus the picture that Christ draws is the fall of a son, of one who is ruled and treated as a son. The sinner's attitude in this life is not so much that of one fighting to gain a promised prize as that of one fighting to retain a treasure already bestowed upon him. It is not that he may win, but lest he lose his adoption as a child of God, that he must watch and pray. This prodigal very nearly lost this privilege forever. Many of the children of God have left home never to return again.

Verse 12. "Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." And his request is granted. God has made man's will free, and when he choses to depart he forces us not to stay; neither does he send us away empty; but lets us go with bodily blessings and mental endowments and worldly goods, in which we choose to seek our happiness. 13. "into a far country." The far country is forgetfulness of God. Here he wasted his substance with riotous living; his substance is all that God permits the sinner to retain when he goes from God. By sinful conduct, all mental gifts and powers, all noble impulses and all kindly affections are wasted like the prodigal's money.

Verse 14. "And when he had spent all." At first he found a certain pleasure in his new life. Sin has its pleasures, but the fascination of these pleasures is soon reached. So this prodigal learned ere long.

"A mighty famine in that land." A mighty spiritual famine—a lack of all that can satisfy and feed the soul. In reality this famine is always in this far country of forgetfulness of God, but is only felt by those who live there, as they one by one come to realize their true state and come to themselves.

Verse 15. "And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country." It is only a question of time how long a sinner may enjoy his own self-respect and be his own master. He will end by hiring himself to the devil, to serve him at any wages he may give him.

Verse 17. "And when he came to himself." All this time he has been beside himself. Sin is insanity. The first step in recovery is: he goes into his own heart. He sees what and where he is. A sense of sin, the first honest gaze into the foulness of his polluted heart. He awakes to a realization of who he is and from where he came and to where he has fallen. I am my father's son! Think of it! And here I am, infinitely below the position of a servant in my father's home. The resolution is made. He arises and starts for home. Will he reach home? Has he strength left to get back? But, while we are wondering, the father finds him. When he was yet a great way off his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him. This is the crowning scene in this picture of a father's love. Had our Lord represented the father as listening patiently to the son's confession, and graciously granting him a new trial, and promising, if his conduct proved the reality of his profession, to pardon the past and restore him to favor, we would have thought the prodigal very mercifully dealt with; but this, seeing him afar off, running and falling on his neck and kissing him, is such an excess of love and goodness that in the mere story it seems unnatural. What earthly father would do this much? But this is not a picture of an earthly father, but of "our Father which art in heaven."

He sees the returning sinner while yet "a great way off," while his heart, as yet, is only beginning to turn to him, and he waits not until the wanderer is come all the way back. God is waiting to be gracious, at once welcoming, receiving, restoring the penitent. God does not wait until trial can be made of the genuineness of our repentance. He saves us upon our coming. The Father helps his son most of the way home, for he found him just as he had started from the far country. How sweet the journey home! What a time of rejoicing when father and son walk through the gate of the old home.

Superiority of the Spiritual.

MR. EDITOR: THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE is again instructing and comforting our home circle with its readable articles and fresh and living editorials.

If to educate is to feed the mind and soul, the position of an editor is fearfully responsible. And is not the idea of feeding the chief element in the old, yet fresh and loving word, education.

Is not educare and not educere the root word? I am inclined to this rendering. The Lord, in giving his last instruction to Peter, says: "Feed my sheep;" "feed my lambs." The great teacher is the best and only infallible authority. The mind, its susceptibilities, needs, powers, adaptations and hidden springs were open to him. "Thou hast searched me and known me." He never made a mistake, for he knew nature in all her wide domain: The material, vegetable and animal kingdoms, were all his own, and he was at home in all their varied departments. The spiritual kingdom is equally his own. "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you heavenly things." My mind luxuriates in the idea that the soul is the real person, the immortal, not born to die.

Bishop Marvin uttered a wholesome and a sublime truth when he boldly said: "Spirit is the only absolute substance." Our system of instruction fails to emphasize this essential truth. We call the young around us, and instruct them as to the reality and relations of the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms, and only incidentally refer to the spiritual universe. How different the teachings of the Holy Scriptures. The first and last chapter presents the spiritual as the source of all things. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." "The Spirit and the Bride say come." Without mind or spirit there could have been neither thrones, principalities or powers, no minerals, vegetables nor animals. How blank and cheerless the system which denies God.

To be without God is to be without hope. There is not so much difference between the present and the future. The faithless, the lost here, are in the precincts of perdition, the agony, the blasphemy and supreme woe, ever and anon felt, are evidences of eternal wretchedness which is in reservation. The same spirit and the same consciousness which is a witness and comfort to the child of God, witnesses to the unregenerate, the fiery indignation which awaits them. As ministers do we honor the Holy Trinity as we should, giving equal and undivided honor to Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Faith in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by the Holy Ghost, is the one great principle which harmonizes the soul, and puts it in the plane of true thought. Enoch walked with God. His faith was the means by which his whole being was elevated. And he is still walking with God. His whole being turned toward God in true, and becoming a temple of the Holy Ghost, living and moving in him; what more now? The man of grace have found glory begun below. Faith in God underlies all virtue and true intelligence. Mind without it, angelic or human mind, is a curse to its possessor and the world, the stronger the mind the worse and the greater curse. Dore's brief description of the devil, "mind without God," is as impressive as clear. The Holy Scriptures honor and inculcates faith, and plainly declare its necessity. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Not the intellect, position or wealth of Abraham is commended, but his faith. We frequently hear it said that the heart is greater than the head. With equal emphasis we may say faith, a sound faith, is the matter of chief concern. Examine yourselves, and see whether you are in the faith; prove your own selves. Faith controls thought, affection, conscience and the life. Yours truly,

JAMES A. PEEBLES.

Faith.

We would say a word about this all-important doctrine. We fear the tendency of the prolix disquisitions and learned discussions on the subject is to darken counsel by multiplying words.

When we remember that it is the condition of salvation, we do not wonder that satan makes his most fearful onsets at this point. If he can foil us here, he has us in his power. He will make an effort to cause us to believe that it requires the exercise of some intellectual effort of which we are incapable. Nothing is easier than to believe the truth. Infidelity requires a greater amount of credulity than Christianity. We are apt to overlook the most radical and the most charming aspect of faith—its utter simplicity. The innocent, unsophisticated child furnishes an example of the purest, strongest, most sublime exhibition of faith. "If a child ask bread of any of you that is a father will he give him a stone? Or, if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent?" "If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give good thing to them that ask him." Given God's omnipotence, and such assurances of his fatherly love and willingness, what room is there for doubt? Except ye be converted and become as little children, or unless ye receive the kingdom of God as a little child, ye cannot enter therein. The child simply takes God at his word. A little girl was absent from Sunday-school. The teacher inquired after her. Another child replied she is sick, but she will be well soon, for I prayed God to make her better. The recovery of her mate was in her mind assured, because she had prayed for her restoration. God give us simple, child-like trust and confidence.

Faith is well-nigh all powerful. "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed ye might say to this mountain be thou removed hence, and it should obey you." "Elijah prayed earnestly that it might not rain, and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. He prayed again, and the heavens gave rain." If the church exercised the faith that it is her privilege to exercise she would soon "come forth clear as the sun, fair as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners." "Lord, increase our faith."

The wisdom and love of God are vindicated in making faith the stipulation in compliance with which we are to be saved. Did our salvation depend upon the payment of a certain amount of money the poor could not be saved. Did it depend on some great feat of physical strength, many of the needy afflicted sons of our apostate race would be excluded. Thank God the condition is of universal application, and a man can believe when he can do nothing else. "If thou canst believe all things are possible to him that believeth."

Colportage Sketches No. 2.

BY A. M. JONES.

A MEMBER OF THE FLOCK.

It was a hot sultry morning in August. My horses were making full speed over a beautiful level road, endeavoring to reach a protracted meeting by eleven o'clock, ten miles ahead. The country had been canvassed, except the families on the road, and I was anxious to stop at every house and reach the church by the appointed time. On hailing at the residence of a well-to-do farmer, with a large front yard, an elderly lady put her head out at the window, and very significantly asked my business. I forced a smile, and as pleasantly as possible wished to know if she wanted a Bible. "We has two now," was the blunt reply, "but how does you sell 'em?" "Almost for nothing; come out and look at them." Leaving the window, she said: "I'll be there in a minute." Just at that time two young ladies, who were sweeping the yard, came around in front. Addressing the elder, I said: "Do you have a Bible of your own?" "We have Bibles enough, sir." "Yes; but don't you want one of your own?" "No; members of the floor has no use for Bibles." Not understanding her meaning, and being a little confused, I exclaimed: "Members of what?" Very coolly she replied: "Members of the floor." After a moment's silence, though the mind was exceedingly active, I divined her meaning, and said: "You dance?" "Yes, I do dance, and will dance whenever I git ready, and don't care who knows it." "You ought not to dance, but get a Bible, read it, be good, and get to heaven." "I love to dance, sir, and will dance whenever I please, but I don't go to church like some folks, and stay a week. I believe in work myself." "I know wicked men like to dance, and go to balls and places of vice, but I am sorry to hear a young lady say she loves to dance." "Well, I reckon women enjoy it as well as men, don't they?" "I suppose they do, but it is not proper for a lady to dance with wicked men, and you ought to quit it, get a Bible, and become religious." At this she straightened herself up to full height, and seemed to grow at least two inches taller, and, pointing her finger direct at my face, said: "I tell you, sir, I love to dance, and will dance whenever I please, and don't care who knows it. And, if I do dance and don't have one of your Bibles, I am just as good as them who goes about here sellin' things and tryin' to cheat the poor folks out of their work." Having delivered this speech, she drew her sun-bonnet close about her face, turned away with the most supreme contempt, and made the dust fly. When the old lady made her appearance she said: "My daughter always says what she thinks; you need not mind her." She thought the Bibles nice and cheap, but, as they had two, declined taking any. Having filled my mission at that house, I went on reflecting. Even the most ignorant know the teachings of the Bible are incompatible with dancing.

That Pint Law.

MR. EDITOR: As a general rule, I do not engage in newspaper controversies. My opinions are deliberately formed, and, when published, left to defend themselves. But there is just spice enough in this "pint law" discussion to tempt me to deviate from my usual course. "Gilderoy," Hon. J. W. McNeil, "W. L. C. H.," and even yourself, Mr. Editor, appear in opposition to my views, personally placing at a great disadvantage, however strong my position may be. Nevertheless, I am neither annihilated, vanquished nor convinced of being in error. I still believe that the opinions expressed and vote cast by me in the Mississippi Legislature were correct, and founded on sound reasons and true political economy. I had had unusually good opportunities for observing the workings of the liquor laws heretofore in force in this State, and had seen how often the laws were evaded by means of bribery and perjury, so cunningly devised as not to be punished. Hence I deemed it best to remove some of the restrictions the law had thrown about the liquor traffic, especially since such removal of restraints would add to the revenues of the State, and redound to the benefit of the public schools. The result in this part of the State has not disappointed me. Neither crime nor drunkenness has been increased. The courts require no longer time for the transaction of business than they did before the "pint law" went into effect. But the public revenue has been increased, and the temptation to bribery and perjury has been lessened. Consequently I am not ashamed to aver that I spoke and voted in favor of the passage of the "pint law."
